From the record it appears that on December 11, 1920, defendant contracted to purchase and plaintiff to sell certain grain bags and twine for a total sum of $9,030. Delivery was not to be made until June or July of the following year, the exact date of delivery to be at buyer's option. The bags and twine were to be used by defendant in the harvesting of his crop. Thereafter and during the month of May, 1921, and before the earliest date for delivery contemplated by the contract, defendant informed plaintiff that his crop had failed and that he would have no use for the bags and twine for that year, and requested that delivery be postponed until the following season of 1922. Plaintiff refused to accede to this request unless he was indemnified against a decline in the price of the articles contracted for. The defendant refused to enter into such an agreement, and thereafter and some time during the month of July, 1921, in lieu of accepting delivery he agreed to pay plaintiff the difference between the contract price and the then market price of the bags, the price having materially declined, this difference amounting to the sum for which the note in question was given.

As a defense to the action, the defendant in his answer alleges that at the time the note was executed plaintiff represented to him that he had on hand the bags and twine contracted for, and that failure on the part of the defendant to accept delivery would result in the loss to him of the amount of the note. It is then alleged that defendant, believing and relying upon said representations and statements, executed the instrument sued upon. Then follows an allegation that at no time did the plaintiff have on hand the bags and twine, and that he had simply "shorted" the market in anticipation that the price of the articles contracted for would drop prior to the time specified for delivery. It is the claim of the defendant that under these circumstances and at the time he executed the note a fraud was committed upon him, for the reason that the plaintiff had not acquired the bags and twine, and was therefore in no position to place him in default.

[1] No question is here raised that the contract in question is invalid or unenforceable by reason of the fact that the seller at the time of entering into the contract did not have in his possession the subject-matter of the contract. Plaintiff had "shorted" the market; but it is conceded, as indeed it must be, that he was well within his rights in so doing, as the bags and twine were to be used by the defendant in his business. Central Oil Co. v. Southern Refining Co., 154 Cal. 165, 97 Pac. 177; 35 Cyc. 46.

[2] It is insisted, however, that, as the plaintiff did not have the bags and twine on hand at the time the note was given in settlement of the transaction, he suffered no loss in actual money, and had, therefore, no remedy against the buyer, and that the statement by him that he had the goods on hand amounted to a deception and a fraud upon defendant in the execution of the note, such as ought to defeat a recovery. In support of this contention it is claimed that the remedy of plaintiff for the refusal of defendant to accept and pay for the property is clearly defined by section 3311 of the Civil Code, which provides for the measure of damages upon the breach of executory contracts, and that the theory embodied in that section contemplates and has as its very essence and foundation possession of the subject-matter of the contract by the vendor as a condition precedent to his right to indemnify himself for his loss by reason of the refusal of the vendee to take the property.

We see no merit in this contention. There is no question that the section invoked does contemplate possession by the vendor of personal property which has been the subject-matter of an executory contract of sale, as its very object and purpose is to establish a measure of damages in the event of a breach of such agreement, where title and possession of the goods are in the vendor. It by no means follows, however, that the provision was ever intended to exclude a recovery upon a breach of a contract in every case where the seller is not possessed of the property sold. Any property which, if in existence, might be the subject of a sale, may be the subject of an agreement of sale whether in existence or not. Civ. Code, § 1730. True, when delivery is demanded, it is essential for the seller to have possession of the articles contracted for in order to fulfill his obligation.

[3] The case comes here on the judgment roll alone. Defendant does not contend by his pleading that it was inherently impossible for plaintiff to have acquired the bags and twine. In fact the possibility of performance is not questioned, and ability by the seller to procure the articles is in a way acknowledged, for it is alleged by the defendant himself that there was a drop in the market price of the bags and twine contracted for. Had delivery been demanded it would have been the duty of plaintiff to procure the articles contracted for and tender them, but he was not bound to do so in order to put defendant in default when he was notified by defendant that his crop had failed and that he would have no need for the same. The law does not require idle acts. It is manifest from defendant's pleading that he did not desire a delivery; and his very act in entering into a settlement in lieu thereof evidences his intention in that regard. Under such circumstances plaintiff was justified in anticipating a breach of the contract, and was not required to possess himself of the articles contracted for. The rule upon the subject is expressed in 13 C. J. 662–663, where it is said that where the tenderee takes any position which would render a tender a vain and idle ceremony a tender is waived. See, also, 24 R. C. L. [Sales] § 384; Pierce v. Lukens, 144 Cal. 397, 77 Pac. 996; Howard v. Galbraith, 13 Cal. App. 373, 109 Pac. 889.

Appellant complains of the fact that plaintiff suffered no actual loss in money. This may be true, but he certainly was entitled to the profits which he derived from the transaction. The note was therefore supported by a sufficient consideration. It was given in settlement and compromise of defendant's obligation. Wetzel v. Cale, 175 Cal. 208, 165 Pac. 692.

From what we have said it follows that defendant's answer presents no defense to the action, and that the judgment rendered on the pleading should be, and it is hereby, affirmed.

CORBIN v. HOWARD et al. (Civ. 4111.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 19, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1043(7)—Permitting withdrawal of insufficient affidavit for continuance not error entitling appellant to relief.

Where plaintiff moved for continuance because of absence of his attorney of record, and before ruling thereon the attorney, representing plaintiff, withdrew the affidavit, and the court thereafter held that he had no right to represent plaintiff at the hearing, in view of the insufficiency of the affidavit to entitle plaintiff to a continuance, permitting its withdrawal, if erroneous, was not such as would entitle plaintiff to relief on appeal.

2. Attorney and client 🔑75(1)—Appointment of attorney without notice to attorney of record where latter abandoned case.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 286, where an attorney of record had abandoned a case by failure to appear at trial, plaintiff could, without notice to the attorney of record, engage another.

3. Appeal and error 🔑966(1)—Continuance 🔑7—Ruling of motion for continuance rests in discretion of trial court and is not reviewable unless abused.

Rulings on a motion for continuance rest almost entirely in the trial court's discretion, and will not be disturbed without a clear showing that there has been an abuse of this discretion.

4. Continuance 🔑20(1)—Denial of not abuse of discretion.

There was no abuse of discretion in denying motion for continuance on account of absence of attorney of record, where there was no showing that counsel was otherwise engaged or had any good excuse for not being present.

5. Judgment 🔑17(4)—Proceeding to trial and judgment without service on unnecessary parties held proper.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 579, providing that in action against several defendants the court may render judgment against one or more of them, leaving the action to proceed against the others whenever a several judgment is proper, in action to cancel a deed where certain defendants were dummies used to convey the property, and had no interest therein at the time the case was commenced, and were not necessary parties thereto, proceeding to trial and judgment without service on them was proper.

6. Deeds 🔑196(2) — Plaintiff held to have burden of proof as to fraud.

In action to cancel a deed for fraud practiced on grantor, the plaintiff had the burden of showing fraud.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Arthur S. Corbin against Emma E. Howard and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kennicott & Williams, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. C. Mishler and John F. Keogh, both of Los Angeles (Julius V. Patrosso, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

CURTIS, J. This action was instituted to obtain a decree canceling a deed given to defendant Emma E. Howard by Frank H. Corbin, of whose estate the plaintiff is the residuary legatee. The ground of cancellation insisted on was that the grantor, to the grantee's knowledge, was mentally incompetent to contract, and that the grantee fraudulently took advantage of the weak mind of the grantor. Frank H. Corbin, by deed executed the 28th day of July, 1916, conveyed to Emma E. Howard certain real property situated in the county of Tulare. Thereafter the said Howard conveyed said land to defendant Lafayette G. Daily, and this defendant, with his wife, the defendant Effie Daily, conveyed the property to defendant A. G. Steuber, who in turn conveyed it to his wife, defendant Laura Steuber. The Steubers borrowed $1,000 from defendant Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, and gave a trust deed, covering said property, to the bank as security for said loan. The action was commenced in March, 1920. Summons was served upon all the defendants except the two Dailys, who it appears resided out of the state. Defendant Howard made default, and the defendants A. C. and Laura Steuber, and the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank answered, denying in one defense that any fraud had been practiced, and in another that they had any notice or knowledge of any fraud practiced upon the grantor, the said Frank H. Corbin. The answering defendants on September 20, 1920, had the case set down for trial for December 22, 1920, and on September 28, 1920, duly served notice of trial on plaintiff's counsel. On the day of trial plaintiff appeared, but without his counsel of record. With the assistance, however, of W. W. Middlecoff, Esq., an attorney other than his attorney of record, he made a motion for continuance on the ground of the absence of his attorney of record, which motion was denied by the court. The trial then proceeded and resulted in a judgment in favor of the defendants who had answered in the case, and as to the defendants who had not answered the trial was continued.

[1] Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and assigns as grounds for reversal the refusal of the court to grant his motion for a continuance. During the discussion before the court relative to plaintiff's motion for a continuance, an affidavit in support thereof had been presented by the plaintiff; afterwards, and before the court had ruled upon the motion for a continuance, the attorney who was then representing plaintiff withdrew this affidavit. The court thereafter held that this attorney had no right to represent plaintiff on the hearing and he withdrew from the case. Plaintiff now contends that as this attorney was acting for him without any right, that he had no authority to withdraw the affidavit and that the court erred in permitting him to do so. The affidavit is set forth in full in the bill of exceptions on file herein. It is clear from a reading of it that it was wholly insufficient to entitle plaintiff to a continuance of the trial of the case. It fails entirely to account for the absence of plaintiff's attorney. It sets forth that on account of sickness of his attorney of record, and on account of his occupation with other business, that he did not prepare the case for trial, but that he had stated to plaintiff that he would have a motion for continuance made in proper time. There was nothing in the affidavit to show that the attorney was then unable to be present in court on account of sickness, or that he was then occupied with other business. The affidavit then proceeds to set forth the names of certain witnesses, and a very imperfect and inadequate statement of the facts which he expected to prove by them, but wholly failed to account for the absence of said witnesses at the trial or for his failure to take their depositions. The affidavit for a continuance was insufficient for any purpose, and being so, the action of the court in permitting its withdrawal, if erroneous at all, was not such error as would entitle plaintiff to any relief on this appeal.

[2] We may further observe, however, that Mr. Middlecoff was authorized to represent the plaintiff, and to stipulate, as he did, that there be a judgment that the plaintiff take nothing as against respondents. The plaintiff's attorney had abandoned the case by failing to appear at the trial. His absence being without excuse, he had ceased to act as such attorney. There remained no reason why the plaintiff could not, without notice to his attorney of record, engage Mr. Middlecoff to represent him at the trial and in all further proceedings of the case. Code Civ. Proc., § 286.

[3] In connection with the objection of the plaintiff that the court erred in denying his motion for a continuance, we might add that the law is well established that the granting or denial of a motion for a continuance rests almost entirely in the discretion of the trial court, and its ruling will not be disturbed without a clear showing that there had been an abuse of this discretion. This question was fully considered in a recent decision of this court, wherein an extended reference was made to the authorities upon this point and the conclusion reached in line with the rule above stated. Flynn v. Fink (Cal. App.) 213 Pac. 716. It will be observed that the case cited was one in which the continuance was asked on account of the absence of counsel who were then engaged in the trial of a case in another court. There was no denial in that case that counsel were so engaged, but the lower court denied the motion for a continuance and its ruling was upheld.

[4] In the case before us, as we have before noted, there was no showing at all that counsel was otherwise engaged or had any good excuse for not being present in court. We are satisfied upon this state of facts that the lower court did its duty in the premises and that no abuse of discretion has been shown.

[5] Plaintiff further contends that the court proceeded to the trial of the action without all of the defendants having been served with summons, and that the case was not then at issue. The defendants not served with summons were Lafayette G. Daily and Effie Daily, his wife. The only mention of these parties in the complaint is that the defendant Howard conveyed to Lafayette G. Daily the real property described in the deed sought to be set aside, and that defendants Lafayette G. Daily and Effie Daily in turn conveyed the property to the defendant Steuber. It is also alleged in the complaint that Lafayette G. Daily had no real interest in the property, but was a mere dummy for the defendant Howard to use in the transaction of her business. The prayer of the complaint is that the conveyances mentioned in the complaint be canceled, that the property be declared to be free of any incumbrance, and that plaintiff's title thereto be quieted. It is evident from these facts that the complaint shows that the Dailys, if they ever had any interest in the property, had none at the time the action was commenced, and that they were not necessary parties to the action, even if they were proper parties. In our opinion they were not even proper parties. Campodonico v. Grossini, 66 Cal. 358, 5 Pac. 609. This being the case, the rights of plaintiff could not be prejudiced by proceeding to trial without the service of process upon the Dailys. As before stated, however, the court expressly continued the case as to the Dailys and Mrs. Howard and proceeded to trial only as to the defendants who had answered, and the judgment rendered is only against these last-named defendants. This procedure was in our opinion justified by the provisions of section 579 of the Code of Civil Procedure, reading as follows:

> "In an action against several defendants, the court may, in its discretion, render judgment against one or more of them, leaving the action to proceed against the others, whenever a several judgment is proper."

[6] It is further contended by the plaintiff that there was no evidence in support of the court's findings that no fraud was practiced on Frank H. Corbin, nor that the deed was obtained by Howard at a time when Corbin was of a weak mind. This is a negative finding on an issue based upon the affirmative allegation of the plaintiff and the defendants' denial thereof. The burden of proof was therefore with the plaintiff to sustain his allegation. Unless the plaintiff produced evidence sufficient to convince the court of the truth of this allegation, it was the duty of the court to find against him, even if the defendants produced no evidence whatever. Upon this issue there was evidence produced by each party. It was extremely limited in amount and indefinite in character. Taking the testimony of plaintiff alone, we seriously question whether it would have supported a contrary finding by the court, and taking the whole of the testimony upon this issue we are satisfied that the finding of the lower court was correct.

There are other findings of the court which the plaintiff maintains were unsupported by the evidence; but the court having found that the original deed was not tainted with fraud, and that the mind of the grantor therein was sound at the date of its execution, the other findings in the case objected to by the plaintiff became immaterial. These findings relate to the amount of the consideration paid for the land, the value of the land, and the knowledge on the part of the defendants as to the condition of mind of the said Frank H. Corbin at the time he executed said deed. The original transaction having been sustained by the court, all other matters and all subsequent acts of the parties became of no consequence. We cannot say, however, that there was no evidence to sustain these last-mentioned findings. On the other hand, we think the record discloses evidence in support of each of them sufficient to warrant the court in the conclusions reached by it.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MARBLEHEAD LAND CO. et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 4143.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 25, 1923.)

1. Eminent domain 🔑76—Deposit of single sum of money as security for each separate owner essential.

In condemnation proceedings under Const. art. 1, § 14, the deposit of a single sum of money as security for each separate owner of property sought to be condemned is a condition precedent to the authority of the court to make any order for the delivery of immediate possession.

2. Eminent domain 🔑76—Deposit for damages for taking highway by state must secure each owner of separate interest in one parcel of land.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1248, providing that a decree in condemnation suits must ascertain and assess the value of the property sought to be condemned, and of each and every separate estate or interest therein, and if it consists of different parcels the value of each parcel and each estate or interest therein shall be separately assessed, the security deposited under Const. art. 1, § 14, must be so given, where an order for possession and use is made, as to secure to each owner of a separate interest in one parcel of land a payment of the amount directed to be paid to him under the final decree of condemnation.

Application by the Marblehead Land Company and others against the Superior Court of California in and for the County of Los Angeles, and Frank R. Willis as Judge thereof, for writ of certiorari to review orders of the Superior Court in condemnation proceedings, and motion to amend writ of review. Orders annulled, and motion to amend writ denied.

For former opinion, see 213 Pac. 718.

Grant Jackson and Newby & Palmer, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., C. C. Carleton, of Sacramento, and Lorrin Andrews, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, J. The present Constitution of California has always contained a provision to the effect that—

> "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made to, or paid into court, for the owner, and no right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation other than municipal until full compensation therefor be first made in money or ascertained and paid into court for the owner, irrespective of any benefit from any improvement proposed by such corporation, which compensation shall be ascertained by a jury, unless a jury be waived, as in other civil cases in a court of record, as shall be prescribed by law." Const. art. 1, § 14.

In fact, this language was the entire text of the section as originally adopted. In 1911 the section was amended in a respect which is not of moment in the present litigation. In 1918 a second amendment was adopted. This amendment opens with the original text as above set forth, the time-honored language being followed immediately by these provisions:

"Provided, that in an action in eminent domain brought by the state, or a county, or a municipal corporation, or a drainage, irriga> tion, levee, or reclamation district, the aforesaid state or political subdivision thereof or district may take immediate possession and use of any right of way required for a public use whether the fee thereof or an easement therefor be sought upon first commencing eminent domain proceedings according to law in a court of competent jurisdiction and thereupon giving such security in the way of money deposits as the court in which such proceedings are pending may direct, and in such amounts as the court may determine to be reasonably adequate to secure to the owner of the property sought to be taken immediate payment of just compensation for such taking and any damage incident thereto, including damages sustained by reason of an adjudication that there is no necessity for taking the property, as soon as the same can be ascertained according to law. The court may, upon motion of any party to said eminent domain proceedings, after such notice to the other parties as the court may prescribe, alter the amount of such security so required in such proceedings."

The section now stands as it was amended in 1918.

On December 13, 1922, the people of the state of California, by the department of public works of the state of California, as plaintiff, filed complaint in eminent domain with respondent superior court. All the petitioners before us for the writ of review were defendants in that action, as were also county of Los Angeles, Reider-Haag Company, a corporation, and eight fictitiously named persons. By the complaint the plaintiff in the action sought to condemn a right of way 19 miles in length for a state highway across that extensive tract of land familiarly known as the Rancho Malibu. After the filing of the complaint, and upon motion to that end, respondent superior court made its two certain orders in the action, each dated December 13, 1922. The first of these, after reciting the fact that the complaint had been filed, and various other matters, including a description of the right of way sought to be condemned, ordered "that the plaintiff * * * deposit in" a certain named bank "the sum of thirty-two thousand one hundred eighty dollars, in a savings account on interest, which sum is to be placed in a special deposit to be paid out only upon the order of the court herein, and to be held as security for payment to the owner or owners of the property sought to be taken as just compensation for the taking of the parcel of land, and any damage incident thereto, including damages sustained by reason of any adjudication that there is no necessity for taking the property as soon as the same can be ascertained according to law," and also "that upon satisfying the court that such has been made in accordance with this order the said plaintiff shall be given an order by the court authorizing it to take immediate possession and use of the right of way hereinabove referred to and described." The second order, after reciting that it satisfactorily appeared to the court that the deposit required by the first order had been made, was to the effect:

> "That the said plaintiff, the state of California, may take immediate possession and use of the right of way described in the complaint and in said order, and which said right of way is described as follows:" (Here followed a description of the right of way.)

It is these two orders which are the subject of the application for the writ of review, and, as we have already remarked, the writ issued.

Respondents made due return to the writ, and the proceeding is now before us upon the question as to what disposition shall be made of the orders sought to be reviewed.

The return shows that the complaint in the condemnation action contained the following allegations concerning the defendants therein:

> "That each, every and all of the said defendants, namely, Marblehead Land Company, a corporation, county of Los Angeles, Hueneme, Malibu & Port Los Angeles Railway, a corporation, Hueneme, Malibu & Southern Railway Company, a corporation, Reider-Haag Company, a corporation, John Doe, Richard Roe, Mary Doe, Jane Roe, John Styles, Richard Styles, Mary Styles and Jane Styles, have or claim to have some right, title, interest, estate or lien in, to or upon the land hereby sought to be condemned and taken, or some part thereof, but the nature and extent of their respective rights, interests, estates or liens are to plaintiff unknown. That the piece or parcel aforesaid sought hereby to be condemned and taken for said public use is a part of a single tract of land."

These are the only allegations of the complaint as to the respective interests of the various defendants in the land sought to be condemned. The prayer of the complaint requests, in part, in entire consonance with the law and practice in condemnation cases:

> "That the respective and separate rights, interests and estates of said defendants be determined by this court and the value of each and every separate estate or interest in and to the property sought to be condemned [be (?)] ascertained and assessed."

[1] One of the contentions by means of which petitioners seek to annul the orders here in question is that respondent court was without jurisdiction to make them upon the giving by the plaintiffs in the action of only a lump sum as the security contemplated by the language of the Constitution. Petitioners contend that separate amounts should have been deposited to secure each of the defendants, and cite Weiler v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 207 Pac. 247, in support of their view. The proceeding in which the opinion there reported was rendered was, like the present one, a proceeding for a writ of review. The order there sought to be annulled was in all respects like the order made by respondent court in the present instance and which we have referred to as the first order made by that tribunal, except that the order in the case cited was based upon a complaint against several defendants, each of whom was the owner of a distinct parcel of land. The Supreme Court, in disposing of the question presented to it, advanced a variety of arguments which seem to us to be equally applicable to the orders here objected to, and concluded:

> "In view of these circumstances it is our opinion that the deposit of a single sum of money as security for each separate owner of property sought to be condemned is a condition precedent to the authority and power of the court to make any order for the delivery of immediate possession, and that an order made without such separate security is in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, and void."

[2] In view of the rule announced in Weiler v. Superior Court, the only question to be considered by us is whether the defendants in the action in which the orders before us were made occupy a position in any wise different from owners of separate parcels of land who may be made defendants in a condemnation suit. It seems plain to us that they do not. We can see no difference, so far as the right to separate security under the Constitution is concerned, between owners of separate parcels of land and owners of separate interests in the same parcel of land. The owners of separate interests of all kinds, whether they fall within the first or the second classification stated in the last preceding sentence, can be divested of such interests in a condemnation suit only as separate defendants. The interests of defendants in such an action are as separate and distinct from each other in the one class as in the other. Section 1248, Code of Civil Procedure, provides (italics ours) that—

> The decree in every condemnation suit must "ascertain and assess * * * the value of the property sought to be condemned, and all improvements thereon pertaining to the realty, and of each and every separate estate or interest therein; if it consists of different parcels, the value of each parcel and each estate or interest therein shall be separately assessed. * * *"

This being the language of the statute as to the requisites of a final decree in condemnation—and it is founded in natural sense and justice and calculated to secure the separate rights of individuals—the people surely intended, in adopting the amendment of 1918 to the Constitution, that the security to be given thereunder, where an order for possession and use is made, must be so given as to secure to each owner of a separate interest in one parcel of land a payment of the amount directed to be paid to him under the final decree of condemnation. We are convinced that the present situation is ruled by Weiler v. Superior Court.

Petitioners advance various other points against the validity of the orders made by respondent court, but we find it unnecessary to consider them.

The motion to amend the writ of review falls to the ground because of the views we entertain as to the point above discussed.

Each of the orders of respondent court is annulled. The motion to amend the writ of review is denied.

STEPHENS et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 10549.)

Master and servant 🔑367—One hauling sand held an "independent contractor" and not "employee" within Compensation Act.

Where a bridge contractor arranged with the owner of wagons and horses to haul sand from a designated place to the bridge, to be paid for on the basis of the cubic yard for the amount hauled, and gave no directions other than to show the place from which it was to be taken and where delivered, and exercised no supervision over the wagon owner's movements, such owner was an independent contractor, and not an employee, within the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831) by H. Westlake, compensation claimant, opposed by William Stephens, employer, and the Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation, Limited, of London, England, insurer. The Industrial Accident Commission made an award, and employer and insurer bring certiorari. Award annulled.

A. E. Graupner and Warren H. Pillsbury, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, J. This is a proceeding to review the action of the Industrial Accident Commission in awarding compensation to H. Westlake, the applicant below, who was injured while hauling sand to be used by Stephens, the insured, in the construction of a bridge.

The issue involved is whether or not Westlake was an employee or an independent contractor.

The undisputed facts in the case appear to be that Westlake, the applicant for compensation, had for many years been the owner of wagons of different capacities, and a number of horses. Stephens, one of the petitioners, was a bridge contractor, and had undertaken to construct a bridge at French Gulch. He arranged with Westlake for the latter to haul the required amount of sand from a designated place to the bridge, to be paid for upon the basis of $1.50 per cubic yard for the amount hauled. Westlake testified before the Commission that Stephens had given him "the whole job" of hauling sand, but later told him he wanted another party to haul part of it. Westlake pursued his own course in hauling the sand. Stephens gave him no directions other than to show him the place from which it was to be taken and where delivered. Westlake was free to come and go as he pleased, using as many or as few wagons as he chose. No supervision, direction, or control of any character was exercised over his movements. He was left to do the work in his own way, by his own methods, and with his own teams. Under these facts, concerning which there is no dispute, Westlake was unquestionably an independent contractor. C., 173 Cal. 250, 159 Pac. 715.

It follows that the award must be annulled, and it is so ordered.

CLEMENT v. DUNCAN et al. (Sac. 3214.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 28, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑870(3)—Interlocutory decree, finding partnership and ordering accounting, is not appealable, so as to preclude review on appeal from final judgment.

In an action for dissolution of a partnership and an accounting, where the defendant denied the partnership, an interlocutory decree, finding the partnership and ordering an accounting, is not one from which an appeal is expressly authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 963, and does not involve a complete and definite adjudication of all the vital issues of fact, so as to be appealable as equivalent to the final judgment, and therefore that decree was reviewable on appeal from the final judgment after the accounting, though defendant had taken an appeal from the interlocutory decree, which was dismissed on his own motion.

2. Corporations 🔑30(6)—Partner held entitled, after transfer of assets to corporation, only to proportion of stock issued for partnership assets.

Where the assets of a partnership were transferred with the consent of both partners to a corporation in exchange for the corporate stock, all of which was issued to the partner in whose name the title to the partnership assets had stood, the other partner is not entitled to a personal judgment against the partner for the amount of his interest in the assets, but is entitled only to receive the proportion of the stock issued for the assets corresponding to his interest in the assets.

3. Corporations 🔑30(6)—Mode of computing partner's interest in stock issued for corporation's assets stated.

tributed to each partner, as well as the amount of capital contributed by one partner and the value of the good will of the partnership business, the interests of each partner in the stock of a corporation issued for transfer of the corporation's assets to the corporation would be the amount which the sum of his share of profits not withdrawn by him, his portion of the good will value, and his unreturned contributions to the partnership capital bore to the total value of the partnership assets.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1177(6)—Final judgment cannot be entered on findings based on wrong theory.

A judgment cannot be entered on appeal on the facts stated in the court's findings where it is evident from the whole record that the trial court erroneously considered that the only question involved was the extent of the undivided profits of the partnership.

5. Partnership 🔑75—Partner held not entitled to interest on advancements in absence of express agreement.

Where one partner advances funds and the other his services, skill, and experience, under an agreement that each shall receive one-half of the profits, the party advancing the money is not entitled to interest on it, in the absence of any agreement for interest.

6. Partnership 🔑75—Partner withdrawing funds held chargeable with interest on overdraft.

Where a partner draws from the partnership funds to be applied to his own use and benefit in excess of what he is entitled to withdraw under the agreement of partnership, interest should be charged on such overdraft.

7. Partnership 🔑300—Good will held properly considered in determining assets of partnership in dissolution proceedings.

The good will of a business being property, under Civ. Code, §§ 992, 993, a transfer of a partnership business to a corporation necessarily involves a transfer of the good will, and it was proper in dissolution proceedings to consider such good will as an asset of the partnership.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by B. L. Clement against W. H. Duncan and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Reversed, with instructions.

Henry B. Neville, of Downieville, H. B. Wolfe, of Quincy, and C. E. McLaughlin and C. P. McLaughlin, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

L. H. Hughes, of Quincy, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. This case was transferred to the District Court of Appeal of the Third District, and after the decision by that court, both sides applied for a transfer to this court. In the main we approve of the opinion written by Mr. Justice Hart in that court, and we adopt the statement of facts prepared by him and the legal conclusions reached by him in that portion of the opinion so prepared hereinafter quoted, as follows:

"This action is for a dissolution of a partnership alleged by the complaint to have been formed and existed between the plaintiff and defendant Duncan, for an accounting of the profits accruing to the partnership during its existence, for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of and administer the partnership affairs pendente lite, and for sale of the property of the partnership and a division of the surplus between said copartners after the debts and liabilities of the partnership had been paid and satisfied.

"According to the complaint, the plaintiff and defendant Duncan, in the month of October, 1913, entered into a partnership under the terms of a parol agreement for the purpose of conducting the business of repairing, buying, and selling automobiles and auto trucks, automobile accessories, oils, gasoline, and supplies, in the counties of Plumas and Sierra, in the former county at the town of Quincy, and in the latter at Loyalton. Under said agreement, it is alleged they so conducted said business from the time of the establishment of the partnership relation between them under the firm name and style of the 'Ford Garage'; that said partnership, in conducting said business, acquired real and personal property, together with certain leasehold interests, said business proving profitable during all of the time of the existence of said partnership, 'having been started with no capital, and having earned, over and above all expenses, profits to such an extent that its assets amounted to $50,000 on the 1st day of January, 1918.' It is further alleged that defendant Duncan has had, at all times during the continuance of said business, custody and control of all books and accounts relating to the business of the copartnership, and likewise has kept the same and made all entries therein of the transactions of said business; that all said books, accounts, and papers relating to said business, consisting of deeds, contracts, leases, note and bills 'are now in the possession of said W. H. Duncan.' It is alleged that as a matter of convenience, all conveyances and leases of real property belonging to the copartnership were taken in the name of said Duncan, and that said conveyances and leases were made in behalf of and for the benefit of the copartnership.

"In the month of December, 1917, so proceeds the complaint, Duncan proposed to plaintiff that, for the more convenient and economical management and conduct of the business of the partnership, the said business be incorporated, each of said partners to be entitled to receive stock in such corporation according as his interest in said partnership might appear upon and after an account of said business; that thereafter a corporation was formed under the name of 'Sierra Auto Supply Company,' with a capital stock of $50,000, divided into 500 shares, of the par value of $100 each; that the directors and stockholders thereof named in the articles of incorporation are W. H. Duncan, B. L. Clement, Edith N. Duncan, N. H. Squire, and J. F. Spooner. Said Clement is the plaintiff herein, said W. H. Duncan is the defendant, said Edith N. Duncan is the wife of the defendant of that name, and Squire and Spooner were employees of the plaintiff and the defendant while they were engaged in conducting said business as copartners. It is averred that the defendant corporation, acting under the 'direction and dictation' of defendant Duncan, issued to said Duncan 496 shares of its corporate stock, and to Edith N. Duncan, Squire, and Spooner, 1 share each; that plaintiff has not had issued to him any share or shares or any evidence of his interest in said corporation; that he has never attended a stockholders' or a directors' meeting of such corporation, nor has he ever been notified of any such meeting to be held, or any knowledge of one ever having been held, and that he has never in any manner participated in the management or control of said corporation; that Edith N. Duncan and the said Squire and Spooner have never paid to said corporation the par value of the stock thereof issued to them, or other sum of money or anything of value for said stock; and that said persons are mere 'figureheads and dummy directors' of the said corporation.

"It is alleged that on the 1st day of January, 1918, said defendant Duncan 'fraudulently and unlawfully, and without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, sold, transferred, and delivered to the defendant Sierra Auto Supply Company all of the property belonging to the copartnership, * * * consisting of real estate, etc., * * * and good will of the business and the Sierra Auto Supply Company now fraudulently and unlawfully pretends to own all of said property.'

"On the 15th day of May, 1918, so the complaint states, the defendants expelled plaintiff from any participation in the affairs of said copartnership, and have ever since excluded him from such participation, and thus have deprived and do still deprive plaintiff of the use and the possession of the property belonging to said copartnership. It is alleged that the defendant corporation is not and has never been the owner of the property of the partnership; that plaintiff has never transferred or conveyed his interest in said property to said or any corporation; that no accounting has ever been had of the affairs of the partnership between plaintiff and the defendant Duncan, or of the respective amounts drawn from the partnership funds by the partners. It is finally charged, upon information and belief, that defendant Duncan, who is president of the board of directors of the defendant corporation, aided by the alleged 'dummy directors,' who, it is alleged, are under the control and domination of said Duncan, intend and design to defraud the plaintiff of his interest in the property and business of said partnership, and that said property and business, being in the full control of said Duncan, 'is in danger of being lost, removed, or transferred to other parties, so as to render any judgment rendered herein ineffectual'; hence, the complaint states, to preserve the said property and business and the interest therein of plaintiff, and to prevent its removal, loss, or illegal sale, it is necessary that a receiver be appointed to take charge of said property and to hold the same pending the determination of this action.

"The answer denies that a copartnership ever at any time existed between plaintiff and defendant Duncan; alleges that the business and the property transferred to the corporation by Duncan and the business conducted under the name of the Ford Garage and the property acquired and used in connection therewith belonged entirely to said Duncan and that he furnished all the capital for the installation and carrying on of said business; alleges that plaintiff was never at any time more than a mere employee of said Duncan; denies that the latter ever at any time made any proposal to the plaintiff that a corporation be formed for the purpose of taking over the business and property of the alleged partnership; admits that Duncan always kept the books and accounts of the Ford Garage, that all leases, conveyances, notes, etc., were made in his name, not in behalf of or for the benefit of the alleged copartnership, but in behalf of himself and for his own benefit; admits that the corporation referred to was formed, and that the business and property of the Ford Garage were transferred to said corporation, and that such transfer was made with the full knowledge of the plaintiff; alleges that to plaintiff one share of the stock of the corporation was issued, but admits that said share, while accredited to plaintiff on the books of the corporation, was never delivered to him; admits that plaintiff has never attended a meeting of the stockholders or directors of said corporation, but alleges that he could have attended such meetings, had he desired to do so, at the times they were held and participated therein; alleges that plaintiff has at all times mentioned in the complaint been an employee of the defendant Duncan and of said corporation, and has received and been paid a monthly salary for his services; that on the 15th day of May, 1918, 'such employment was terminated and said Clement released therefrom.'

"The answer, proceeding further, sets forth the details of an alleged contract of employment whereby plaintiff was engaged by said corporation as a salesman after the transfer of the property and business of the Ford Garage to the corporation; and alleges that, from the date of the organization of said corporation to the 15th day of May, 1918, the plaintiff's connection with and sole interest in said corporation was only that of a salesman.

"The court, on hearing evidence, made findings upon which it rendered and caused to be entered an interlocutory decree, whereby it adjudged, in harmony with its findings, that a partnership existed between the plaintiff and Duncan since the month of October, 1918, and that the same 'has never been dissolved; that the plaintiff is entitled to an account of all partnership funds and transactions relating thereto and to a dissolution of said partnership; that an accounting is necessary between the plaintiff and the defendant W. H. Duncan, covering all the property and business between them from the time of the commencement of said copartnership.' By said decree Duncan was required to render to the court, within 15 days after the date of the decree, a full and true account of the business of said partnership, and thereupon, and after a settlement of said account, 'the court will enter its final judgment herein.'

"An appeal was taken by defendant Duncan from the interlocutory decree, but was subsequently dismissed on his motion.

"The defendant Duncan reported to the court that 'it is impossible for the said defendant to render and file herein an accounting that will conform to and comply with the terms of the said interlocutory decree,' and thereupon, and at the request of the defendant, the court appointed F. C. Radcliffe, an expert accountant, to examine into and 'report on all the affairs of the said copartnership,' and to return the same to the court. Within due time the said accountant made his report to the court, and said report and all objections or exceptions thereto were heard and determined. Upon this report and the taking of further evidence ultimate findings were made, and these, together with the findings previously made, constitute the predicate for the final judgment which was rendered and entered in favor of the plaintiff, and from which the present appeal is prosecuted by the defendant Duncan.

[1] "The respondent first makes the point that the interlocutory decree involved a full and final determination of all the issues raised by the pleadings, and that it was therefore appealable; that the said defendant, having dismissed his appeal from said judgment or decree, cannot now have the same reviewed on an appeal from the final judgment. The proposition is obviously without merit. There are certain interlocutory decrees from which an appeal will lie by virtue of express authorization therefor by section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But the case here does not come within the terms of said section. There may, however, be cases not coming within the purview of said section, in which an interlocutory decree may involve a full, complete, and definite adjudication of all the material or vital issues of fact arising in the case. In such a case there is no sound reason why such a decree should not be appealable, and, indeed, we would say that it is, since, to all intents and purposes, it would amount to a final judgment. See Clark v. Dunnam, 46 Cal. 204. But this is not such a case. The interlocutory decree 'was based upon findings which determined none of the questions at issue except the fact of partnership and the existence of mutual and undetermined claims and demands, and upon a conclusion of law which declared no more than that an accounting was necessary. The decree, declared by the court itself to be an "interlocutory decree," appointed a referee to state an account, the settlement of which was essential to the fixing of the relative rights of the parties in the partnership property. Under all the authorities, such a decree is not final.' Doudell v. Shoo, 159 Cal. 448, 453, 114 Pac. 579, 581, and cases therein cited. See, also, Gray v. Palmer, 9 Cal. 636, and Gianelli v. Brisco, 40 Cal. App. 532, 181 Pac. 105.

"Upon the merits, the appellant first contends that the remedy of the plaintiff, if any at all he had, was an action against the corporation to compel it to issue to him so much of its stock as his interest in the partnership entitled him to. These general contentions are also pressed: That certain findings are not supported by the evidence; that certain vital findings are inconsistent with each other; that the findings do not support the judgment, and a failure to find on a material issue.

"The court found that the partnership between the plaintiff and the defendant Duncan was formed and existed as alleged in the complaint, and continued to exist until on or about the 1st day of January, 1918; that the plaintiff and said defendant conducted said business under the firm name and style of Ford Garage, and maintained places of business in the counties of Plumas and Sierra, as stated in the complaint; that certain real and personal property, together with certain leasehold interests for garage and shop purposes, were acquired by said copartnership, and that the business was conducted under the joint management and control of the plaintiff and defendant Duncan; that the said Duncan, at all times during the continuance of the business of the partnership, had the custody of all books and accounts relating to the business of said partnership and that said books and accounts were at all times kept and entries made therein by the said Duncan or under his direction; that the conveyances and leases of real property belonging to said partnership were taken for purposes of convenience in the name of said Duncan, and were made in behalf of and for the benefit of the partnership; that the defendant proposed to plaintiff that the said partnership business which they were then conducting and had theretofore conducted as partners be incorporated under the laws of the State of California; that said corporation was formed and organized under the laws of said state under the name of Sierra Auto Supply Company, and that on or about the 1st day of January, 1918, said Duncan, with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff, transferred and delivered to the said corporation all the property belonging to said partnership; that a full, complete, and true account has been taken of all the business affairs and transactions of said partnership, and that, all the property belonging to said partnership during its existence having been sold and conveyed to the said corporation prior to the commencement of this action, there is not now any property of any kind or nature belonging to, or standing in the name of, the said partnership, and that said partnership has now no assets or liabilities; that the plaintiff, as a copartner in said business, was and is now entitled to one-half of all the profits earned and acquired by said partnership during its existence; that said partnership business was terminated upon the sale and transfer of its assets to said Sierra Auto Supply Company on January 1, 1918; 'that the defendant, W. H. Duncan, at various times, contributed capital in the sum of $24,000 for the operation of the business conducted by said copartnership, but that there was no agreement between said copartners for the payment of interest thereon.'

"It is alleged that the 'good will' of the business conducted by said plaintiff and defendant Duncan was at the time of the transfer of said business to the said corporation of the value of $12,500, and that said good will was an asset of said copartnership business at said time, and that the plaintiff was at said time the owner of one-half of the value of said good will. The court found that the corporation was capitalized for $50,000, divided into 500 shares, of the par value of $100 per share, and that subsequent to its organization the said corporation issued to the defendant Duncan 496 shares of its capital stock, at the par value of $100 per share. It was also found that during the existence of said partnership it was understood and agreed that the plaintiff should have and use from the funds thereof such sums as would be necessary for living and traveling expenses, and that plaintiff did, pursuant to said agreement, withdraw from said copartnership certain funds for his personal use, but that during the existence of said copartnership he withdrew from the funds thereof for his personal use in excess of said allowance, and not expended by him for the benefit of said copartnership, the sum of $9,293.41; that the defendant Duncan, during the existence of said partnership, withdrew from the funds of said partnership for his personal use, and not by him expended for the benefit of said copartnership the sum of $1,198.41. It was found that during the time said copartnership was in existence the partnership earned and acquired in profits, over and above all expenses properly chargeable to said firm, the sum of $33,109.74; that plaintiff was and is now entitled to one-half of said net profits, to wit, the sum of $16,554.87, of which he has received the sum of $9,293.41, leaving the balance now due him of $7,261.46, which, including one-half of the value of good will, aggregates the sum of $13,511.46; that by reason of the sale of the assets of said copartnership by the defendant W. H. Duncan to the Sierra Auto Supply Company the said defendant has received for and on account of the interest of plaintiff in said copartnership the sum of $13,511.46.

"As conclusions of law the court declared the dissolution of said copartnership and found that the accounting taken before the court is a full and complete accounting of all the partnership affairs existing between plaintiff and defendant, and that all interests of said copartners therein have been fully determined and settled; that there are no liabilities outstanding against said copartnership, and that said copartnership has no assets or property, and that said partnership affairs have been fully wound up and closed; that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendant Duncan in the sum of $13,511.46; that the plaintiff take nothing against the defendant Sierra Auto Supply Company by reason of this action. The judgment awards the plaintiff said amount, together with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from and after the 1st day of January, 1918, to the date of the entry of the judgment on the 30th day of September, 1920, amounting to the sum of $2,600.98, making the total amount $16,112.44."

In addition to the facts stated in the foregoing quotation from the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, the following facts may be stated:

It was found in the interlocutory decree that the partners had agreed to divide the profits of the business equally between them; that the defendant W. H. Duncan had advanced some of the capital, and that during the month of August, 1917, it had been agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant W. H. Duncan that the business conducted by them should be incorporated; that such corporation was formed under the name of the Sierra Auto Supply Company; that all of the property belonging to the copartnership was by mutual consent transferred to such corporation; and that the corporation has since the 1st of January, 1918, been conducting said business. It was also found by the court that the defendant the Sierra Auto Supply Company is the owner of all the property sold, transferred, and conveyed to it by the defendant W. H. Duncan. The interlocutory judgment recited that the partnership had never been dissolved and required the defendant W. H. Duncan to render an account.

These findings made at the time of the entry of the interlocutory decree were specially referred to and adopted in the final findings of the court. It was also found "that the plaintiff, B. L. Clement, as such copartner, was and is now entitled to one-half of all the profits earned and acquired by the said copartnership during its existence." It was found also that the copartnership business was terminated by the sale and transfer of its assets to the Sierra Auto Supply Company, a corporation, on January 1, 1918.

[2] The fundamental error of the trial court was in rendering a personal money judgment in favor of B. L. Clement and against W. H. Duncan. It appears from the allegations of the complaint, which were admitted by the answer, and also by the findings of the court, that the assets of the copartnership were sold by the copartnership to the defendant corporation, and that the entire stock of that corporation was issued in exchange for such property. It follows from this that whatever rights and interest the respective partners had in the partnership property was by mutual consent converted into the stock of that corporation and that the decree of the court should either have authorized a division of that stock in accordance with the respective interests of the copartners in the copartnership property, or should have ordered the stock sold and the proceeds distributed in that proportion.

[3] There was no express finding by the trial court as to the value of the property transferred by the copartnership to the defendant corporation. The court found that the profits of the copartnership were $33,109.74; that $10,491.82 of these profits had been distributed to the copartners—$9,293.41 having been distributed to the plaintiff and $1,198.41 to the defendant Duncan. The court also found that the value of the good will belonging to the copartnership was $12,500, and that the defendant W. H. Duncan had contributed $24,000 in capital to the copartnership. It was not expressly found whether any of his capital investment had been returned to W. H. Duncan. If no part of this capital had been returned to W. H.

Duncan, then the property transferred to the defendant corporation included $22,617.90 undivided profits, $12,500 good will, which also represented an undivided profit or increment, and $24,000, the amount of capital invested by Duncan; the total property value transferred by the copartnership to the corporation would be the sum of these items, amounting to $59,117.90.

The respective interests of the copartners in their property thus transferred was as follows: Plaintiff's portion of this residue of the property would be his half interest in the good will, $6,250, plus the balance of his half of the profits not withdrawn, namely, $7,261.46. The defendant Duncan's share in this residuum would be $15,356.40 (being his half of the undivided profits, less $1,198.43 withdrawn), plus his one-half of the value of the good will, $6,250, and the capital of $24,000, making a total of $45,606.45. From these calculations it would follow that the 500 shares of stock of the defendant corporation should have been divided between the former partners in the proportion which $13,511.46 bears to $45,606.45, belonging to the defendant; that is to say, the plaintiff was entitled to $13,511.58, divided by 59,117.90, multiplied by 500 shares, and the defendant Duncan was entitled to $45,606.45, divided by 59,117.90, multiplied by 500 shares; that is, the plaintiff would be entitled to 114.27 shares and the defendant to 385.72 shares.

[4] A judgment might be entered upon the findings in accordance with the foregoing suggestion, were it not for the fact that it is evident from the whole record that the trial court considered that the only question involved was the extent of the undivided profits, to one-half of which the plaintiff was entitled. The judgment did not undertake to fix the rights of the defendant Duncan, except by inferentially holding that Duncan was entitled to whatever was left after the plaintiff got all that he was entitled to.

[5] In connection with a new trial and for the purposes thereof, we adopt the following portion of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal:

"In connection with the proposition just disposed of, it should be stated that whether said Duncan is entitled to interest on the money which was advanced by him depends upon whether there was or was not an express agreement to that effect. The settled rule is stated as follows in Tirrell v. Jones, 39 Cal. 655, quoting the syllabus: 'In a contract between two parties, in which it is conditioned that one shall advance the necessary funds in the execution of the contract, and the other his services, skill and experience, and that each shall receive an equal portion of the profits, the party advancing the money is not entitled to interest on the same in the absence of any agreement that he should receive interest.' See, also, Carpenter v. Hathaway, 87 Cal. 435; Price v. Olcovich, 142 Cal. 47, and Ann. Cas. 1913A, p. 173.

[6] "As a guide to the court in the retrial of the case, it is proper to say that as to interest on the overdrafts by the partners, the rule is as it is stated by Justice Shaw in Forsyth v. Butler, 152 Cal. 396, 402, 403, 93 Pac. 90. The rule, generally stated, seems to be that, where a partner draws from the partnership funds to be applied to his own use and benefit an amount in excess of that which he is entitled to withdraw under the agreement of partnership or any other agreement between the partners, interest should be charged on such overdraft. This proposition depends on the condition on which, or the circumstances under which, the overdraft may be made. As to the overdrafts made by the plaintiff and the defendant Duncan in this case, the evidence is so unsatisfactory that we are unable to determine whether it was proper for the court to charge against the partners interest on the amount drawn by each of them from the partnership fund in excess of what they were entitled to.

[7] "The appellant challenges the finding relative to the good will of the partnership business. The court found that the good will of said business was of the value of $12,500. We cannot say that this finding is not supported. In fact, it is not necessary for us to go into the evidence for the purpose of determining that fact, since, as seen, the cause must be sent back for retrial on another ground. But we refer to the finding only because it seems to be the view of the appellant that good will did not enter as an element into the business affairs of the partnership, or, in other words, is not an asset of the partnership which may be taken into consideration in this case. Under our Code the good will of a business is property, transferable like any other; it being 'the expectation of continued public patronage.' Civ. Code, §§ 992 and 993. The transfer of the partnership business to the corporation necessarily involved a transfer of the good will of the business, and it was proper for the court to consider and determine the value of said good will as an asset of the partnership, in ascertaining and settling the value of the business and the profits which came therefrom in the years during which the partnership existed."

Judgment reversed, with instructions to the trial court to ascertain the relative rights of the parties in the stock of the defendant corporation, and to partition such stock between the parties in accordance with their respective rights. The interlocutory finding and judgment that the plaintiff is entitled to one-half of the profits of the copartnership, and that the relation between plaintiff and defendant W. H. Duncan was that of copartners, to stand as a basis for the settlement of the account. The dividends derived from the stock, if any, to be divided in the same proportion as the stock, neither party to have any interest upon the moneys due them unless upon a new trial the court, acting in pursuance of this opinion, finds that the defendant W. H. Duncan is entitled to interest upon the $24,000 capital advanced by him. If such interest is allowed, such interest shall be included in the amount going to the defendant W. H. Duncan from the copartnership at the time the property of the copartnership was transferred to the corporation and his share of the stock will be proportionately increased. No interest shall be allowed to either of the partners from and after the date of such transfer.

The trial court may also determine what part of the $24,000 advanced by the respondent, if any, has been repaid, and shall proportionately diminish his share of the stock.

PEOPLE v. BROWN. (Cr. 955.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 6, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 4, 1923.)

1. Forgery 🔑34(8)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of passing fictitious check under count not amended by insertion of correct name of purported signer.

In a prosecution under Pen. Code, §§ 470, 476, for forgery, and for making, passing, etc., a fictitious check, which, as set out in each count, purported to be signed by "J. Burke & Co.," but was described as signed by "J. Burke," testimony of an officer of the bank, on which it was drawn, that he found no account in the name of either "J. Burke & Co.," or "J. Burke," held sufficient to sustain conviction under the count charging passage of a fictitious check, though only the count charging forgery, which was dismissed, was amended to read "J. Burke & Co."

2. Criminal law 🔑829(1)—Refusal of instruction fully covered by one given not error.

Refusal of an instruction fully covered by one given is not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

John C. Brown, otherwise known as Thomas Morgan, was convicted of passing a fictitious check, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. C. Trott, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CURTIS, J. In this action the defendant was convicted, under section 476 of the Penal Code, of making, uttering, publishing, and passing a fictitious check. The information contained two counts. In count 1 the defendant was accused, under section 470 of the Penal Code, of the crime of forgery. And in count 2, under section 476, of the crime of making, etc., a fictitious check. The check, as set out in full in each count of the information, purported to be signed by "J. Burke and Co." In the body of the information, however, and in each count thereof the check was described and referred to as a check "purporting upon its face to be signed by a certain person and individual named J. Burke." The check, when introduced in evidence, had the name of "J. Burke & Co." signed thereto. After the close of the testimony of the people the district attorney asked leave to amend the information so that the same should read "J. Burke & Co." instead of "J. Burke." Count 1 of the information was amended by substituting the words "J. Burke & Co." for the words "J. Burke." No amendment, however, was made to count 2 of the information. The defendant was convicted under count 2, and thereafter, upon motion of the district attorney, count 1 of the information was dismissed.

The first point made by appellant on his appeal is that there is a material variance between the allegations of the information and the evidence introduced in support thereof, in that, while there was testimony to the effect that there was no such person or association of persons as "J. Burke & Co.," there was no evidence that there was no such person as "J. Burke" in existence. It is true, as we gather from the record before us, the case was tried upon the theory that the fictitious check purported to be the check of "J. Burke & Co.," and not that of "J. Burke." By an apparent oversight, however, of both court and counsel, count 2 of the information was not amended. The trial of the case proceeded upon the theory that it had been. The evidence of the officer of the bank was that he had searched the records of the bank upon which the check had been drawn and found no such account as "J. Burke & Co."

[1] Appellant, however, insists that, as count 2 was never amended, the proof in the action must conform thereto, and that the prosecution must show that there was no such person as J. Burke in existence. We would question very much the correctness of this contention, in view of the proceedings had in this case. However, we are of the opinion that even under appellant's contention the evidence in the case is sufficient.

The officer of the bank not only testified that he had searched the records of the bank upon which the check had been drawn, and found no such account as "J. Burke & Co."; he went further and testified in substance that he found no account in the name of "J. Burke," and that if there was any such account he did not see it. He also testified that the records of the bank searched by him were those of the main bank, and that the check in evidence was drawn upon the main bank.

We think this testimony was sufficient to show that there was no account in the bank in the name of "J. Burke." Such testimony is prima facie evidence of the fictitious character of the check. People v. Eppinger, 105 Cal. 36, 38 Pac. 538.

The point, therefore, made by appellant that there is a variance between the allegations of count two of the information and the proof is not, in our opinion, well taken.

The appellant further assigns as error the ruling of the court requiring the defendant to answer on cross-examination certain questions over the objection of his counsel, and also the giving by the court of an instruction on behalf of the prosecution, and the refusal of the court to give an instruction offered by the defendant. We find nothing in the admission of this testimony, nor in the action of the court in giving plaintiff's instruction, nor in refusing to give that offered by the defendant, that in any way prejudiced defendant's legal rights. The most objectionable of the questions asked of defendant on cross-examination, and the one upon which appellant appears to place the most reliance for a reversal of the case, seems never to have been objected to by defendant, and the others were not of such a character as would render them objectionable upon the ground that they required the defendant to be a witness against himself.

[2] As to the rulings of the court upon the instructions we find that defendant's instruction No. 2, which was refused by the court, is fully covered by defendant's instruction No. 1. And we are further of the opinion that the jury could not have drawn any inference, unfavorable to the defendant, from that portion of the court's general instruction objected to by the appellant when read in connection with the whole of this instruction.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

EISEMAN v. DAUGHERTY, Commissioner of Corporations. (Civ. 4123.)

Certiorari ⚷60—Application for review of order revoking license which had expired discharged.

An application for certiorari to review an order of the commissioner of corporations revoking petitioner's license as a broker for the year 1917, which, under St. 1917, p. 677, § 5, had expired before all the briefs were filed, will be discharged, the question being moot.

Application for certiorari by J. J. Eiseman to annul an order of Edwin H. Daugherty, as Commissioner of Corporations for the State of California, revoking petitioner's license as a broker. Writ discharged.

Roy A. Bronson and R. L. Carlisle, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman and H. H. Linney, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondent.

WORKS, J. In this proceeding for review, petitioner seeks to annul an order made by respondent and revoking petitioner's license as a broker, granted to him under the terms of the Corporate Securities Act, so called. The writ of review issued, and respondent has made due return thereto.

The license was for the calendar year 1922. The Corporate Securities Act contains a section to the effect that every certificate licensing a broker "shall expire on the thirty-first day of December next after its issuance, unless sooner revoked." Stats. 1917, p. 677, § 5; Deering, Consol. Supp. Gen. Laws, 1917–1921, p. 1450. Petitioner's application for the writ of review was filed November 8, 1922; his opening brief in support of the petition was filed December 27, 1922; respondent's brief was filed January 23, 1923; and petitioner's reply brief was filed March 2, 1923, after which last date we made our order submitting the proceeding for decision.

Respondent contends that the proceeding is now moot. Under exactly similar conditions a court of another jurisdiction said, after stating the facts:

> "It appears, therefore, that this court, upon a writ of certiorari, is without power to give any substantial relief, even should we reach the conclusion that the relator was not properly deprived of her license. A license which expired by express provisions of the statute on the first Tuesday of May, 1907, could not be given any vitality by an order of this court after that date." People v. Bogart, 122 App. Div. 872, 107 N. Y. Supp. 831.

This court has said, upon facts which make the case applicable here:

> "The writ of review will not be granted where no beneficial result will follow." Manoogian v. Superior Court, 48 Cal. App. 609, 192 Pac. 168.

The only contention made by petitioner in response to the point presented by respondent is that if the order revoking the license is allowed to stand it will be difficult for him to procure a license as a broker for this or for future years, the alleged manner in which he conducted his business under the license being the cause for its revocation. This we cannot assume. On the contrary, we are bound to assume that respondent will issue to petitioner a broker's certificate at any time that he shows himself entitled to it. However, whatever we may assume on this question is beside the mark. The only point really before us is whether petitioner was legally and constitutionally deprived of his license for the year 1922. As, even if the order of respondent had not been made, his certificate would have expired with that year, there is no substantial question left for us to decide. The writ of review should be discharged, as that is the proper practice in such a situation. Visalia Water Co. v. Superior Court, 120 Cal. 219, 52 Pac. 485.

Writ discharged.

TURNER, KUHN & FRASER, Inc., v. JONES et al. (Civ. 4469.)

1. Sales 🔑199—Parties may agree when title shall pass.

Under a sale contract the parties may agree when title shall pass, and if they expressly do so the contract controls, even though the subject-matter has only a potential existence.

2. Sales 🔑197—Rule as to passing of title in completed and executory contracts stated.

Where contract fails to express intention as to when property shall pass, the presumption is that the contract is an actual sale, if the specific thing is agreed on and is ready for immediate delivery, but that the contract is only executory when the goods have not been specified, or if, when specified, something remains to be done to put them in a deliverable shape or to ascertain the price.

3. Sales 🔑199—Whether title passed is question of intention, where contract does not so indicate.

Where a contract does not so indicate, the question whether title has passed is one of intention of parties, to be gathered from the language as expressed in the contract, considered in the light of the circumstances.

4. Sales 🔑199—"Cotton contract purchase" held not conclusive as importing present sale of cotton.

The mere use of words of present sale is not absolutely controlling, unless the contract shows such intent, and hence the fact that a contract was headed "Cotton Contract Purchase" was not in itself conclusive on the subject.

5. Sales 🔑214 — Cotton purchase contract held not to complete transfer of title.

Where the seller of cotton was called on to mature, harvest, gin, bale, and deliver it at a future date, at certain places, and only on payment of the price and on proper segregation, the contract was for a future sale, notwithstanding that a considerable portion of the purchase price was paid at the time the contract was made.

6. Evidence 🔑471(29) — Evidence to show that present transfer of cotton was intended by contract inadmissible.

Where evidence would have amounted to no more than witness' conclusion as to the intent of the contract to show a present sale, there was no error in refusing to permit its introduction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by Turner, Kuhn & Fraser, Inc., against W. F. Jones and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel French, of Los Angeles, and Harris & Hayhurst, of Fresno, for appellant.

Lindsay & Conley, of Fresno, Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco, F. W. Docker, of Fresno, and Joseph C. Sharp, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. This is an action for damages against the sheriff of Fresno county and the surety on his official bond for the value of certain cotton levied upon by him under a writ of attachment and sold under execution in the attachment suit. The process issued out of an action in which Miller & Lux, Inc., was plaintiff and one A. H. Calkins defendant. Calkins was the lessee of a certain tract of land situated in the county of Fresno, which he had planted to cotton. In the month of July, 1919, he entered into a written contract with Turner, Kuhn & Fraser, Inc., a corporation, appellant herein, with reference to the sale of a portion of his crop. Under the terms of this agreement, which is denominated a cotton purchase contract, Calkins undertook to sell to the corporation 100 bales, each of 500 pounds in weight, of the cotton growing on the property, which at the time of the agreement had not been matured, picked or harvested. The quality of the commodity contracted for was described in the agreement as being from the low-middling to good-middling grades first ginned from the crop, at a price of 32 cents a pound for middlings, with an allowance for the other grades off and on. The sum of $7,000, or $70 per bale, was paid on account of the purchase price, such sum being approximately one-half of the amount due under the contract, the balance to be paid for upon delivery.

At the time of the execution of the agreement Calkins was of the opinion that his harvest would amount to some 300 bales. He agreed to mature, harvest, and gin the quantity of cotton contracted for and deliver the same within the period intervening the date of the contract and December 25, 1919, in the city of Oxalis, county of Fresno, at any cotton yard there situated, the balance of the purchase price of each bale to be paid upon delivery as delivered. In the attachment suit above referred to the sheriff levied upon the whole crop of cotton as the property of Calkins. Appellant made its third party claim, and the plaintiff in the attachment suit thereupon indemnified the sheriff and the attachment held. When the entire crop was harvested, contrary to expectation it amounted to but 36 bales, all of which were within the grades stipulated for in the contract of purchase. Plaintiff again gave notice to the sheriff claiming these 36 bales under its contract, but the sheriff proceeded to sell the cotton under execution in the attachment suit. The sale was made to Miller & Lux, Inc., the plaintiff therein, for the sum of $5,462, and this amount is conceded to be the reasonable market value of the product at that time.

Turner, Kuhn & Fraser thereupon brought this action in conversion against the sheriff and his bond. Trial was had without a jury. Judgment went for defendants, and this is an appeal therefrom.

[1] The sole question here presented is whether or not title to the property in question passed to plaintiff under the agreement above referred to. Under a contract of sale the parties may agree when title shall pass. If they expressly do so, their contract controls, even though the subject-matter has only a potential existence. If they do not so previously agree, and a dispute arises as to the true character to the agreement, the question is one rather of fact than of law.

[2] In discussing this subject Mr. Benjamin, in his work on Sales, in substance states that it not infrequently happens that parties fail to express their intentions as to when property, the subject of a sale, shall pass, or that they manifest them so imperfectly as to leave it doubtful what they really mean, if indeed they have any definite intentions, for the reason that the question was not brought up to them. In such cases courts have adopted the construction that, when there has been no clear manifestation of intention the presumption of law is that the contract is an actual sale if the specific thing is agreed upon and is ready for immediate delivery; but that the contract is only executory when the goods have not been specified, or if, when specified, something remains to be done to put them in a deliverable shape, or to ascertain the price. In the former case there is no reason for imputing to the parties any intention to suspend the transfer of the property, inasmuch as the thing and the price have been mutually assented to and nothing remains to be done. In the latter case, when something is to be done to the goods it is to be presumed that the parties intended to make the transfer of the property dependent upon the performance of the things yet to be done, as a condition precedent. Of course, these presumptions yield to proof of a contrary intent. Benjamin on Sales, §§ 308, 312.

[3] Such, in effect, is the rule which has been adopted in this state upon the subject by a long line of authorities. Accordingly, it has been held that there can be a present transfer of title of the product of crops growing and unmatured where the contract conclusively indicates that the transaction constitutes a sale. Hamilton v. Klinke, 42 Cal. App. 426, 183 Pac. 675. Where, however, the contract does not so indicate it is well settled that the question whether title has passed is one of intention of the parties. And such intention is to be gathered from the language as expressed in the contract considered in the light of all the circumstances. Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 76 Cal. 212, 18 Pac. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199; Globe Grain Co. v. Drenth, 36 Cal. App. 156, 171 Pac. 821; Bill v. Fuller, 146 Cal. 50, 79 Pac. 592; Madison v. Weyl-Zuckerman, 48 Cal. App. 308, 192 Pac. 110. The intent of the parties is the controlling element. If the agreement contains provisions definitely settling the matter such provisions, of course, control. Potts Drug Co. v. Benedict, 156 Cal. 322, 104 Pac. 432, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 609. On the other hand, where the intentions of the parties regarding the matter cannot be ascertained from the agreement the courts have enforced the general rule that title will not pass until the thing is identified for delivery and perhaps tendered. Farmer v. Leaf, 46 Cal. App. 542, 189 Pac. 735.

[4] The written contract here involved is headed "Cotton Contract Purchase," and the parties thereto are designated as "seller" and "buyer." This phraseology, however, is not in itself conclusive upon the subject, and, indeed, it is not even so contended. There is no question but that such language has a certain persuasive force in determining the intention of the parties, as it imports a present sale. Bill v. Fuller, 146 Cal. 50, 79 Pac. 592; McRae v. Heath (Cal. App.) 212 Pac. 228. But the mere use of words of present sale is not absolutely controlling unless the contract shows such intent. Potts Drug Co. v. Benedict, 156 Cal. 322, 329, 104 Pac. 432, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 609; Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 76 Cal. 212, 18 Pac. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199. And the same may be said of the fact that a considerable portion of the purchase price was paid. Gianelli v. Globe G. & M. Co., 48 Cal. App. 103, 191 Pac. 720. Other features of the contract, which we do not deem necessary to consider, are suggested by appellant as indicating that the sale was an executed one.

[5] Here the contract requires many things to be done by the seller, which negative the idea of an absolute sale. He is called upon to mature, harvest, gin, bale, and deliver the cotton; such delivery is at a future date, at certain places, and only upon payment of the price upon proper segregation, all of which circumstances present features of a contract for a future sale and not of a present one. There can be no question that these elements, though not conclusive upon the subject, present the same persuasive force as opposing the theory of a completed transfer, as the indicia relied upon by the appellant and above referred to support its claim of a present sale. Taking all the conditions of the contract, therefore, into consideration, and viewing them in the light of the evidence and surrounding circumstances, we are of the opinion that the trial court was justified in concluding that the plaintiff was not the owner of the cotton, and its determination upon the subject is conclusive here.

[6] The further claim is made that, even assuming that the instrument does not show a present sale, the plaintiff should have been permitted to present parol evidence to the effect that such a one was intended. We see no merit in this contention. The trial court did permit, at appellant's request and over the objection of defendants, evidence of the facts surrounding the execution of the contract for the purpose of showing the intention of the parties. It is true that certain questions calling for the opinion of a witness as to the effect of the contract were rejected. The answers thereto would have amounted to no more than his conclusion upon the subject, and objection thereto was properly sustained. No other questions are presented.

From what we have said, it follows that the judgment should be and it is hereby affirmed.

BRYDEN v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 4093.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 27, 1923.)

Master and servant 🔑373—Injury from holdup held not compensable, as "arising out of employment."

Where an employee guarding employer's property suffered an injury resulting from a holdup during working hours, the criminals not being after anything except the contents of his pockets, the injury did not arise out of his employment within the Workmen's Compensation Act.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment.]

Application by Robert Bryden for a writ of review to annul an order of the Industrial Commission of the State of California, denying compensation for injuries, opposed by this Commission, A. J. Pillsbury and others, constituting the members thereof, the Pan-American Petroleum Company, and the State Compensation Insurance Fund. Award affirmed.

Olin Wellborn and Stephen Monteleone, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WORKS, J. Petitioner was an employee of respondent Pan-American Petroleum Company and suffered certain injuries during the period of his employment. Because of these injuries he presented to respondent Industrial Accident Commission his application for compensation under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831). After due hearing the commission made its order or award that petitioner take nothing by reason of his claim. Petitioner applied for a rehearing before the commission, and, his application being denied, he filed his petition in this court for a writ of review. The writ issued, and to it respondents have made return.

The facts upon which our inquiry is to be based, taking them from the testimony of petitioner himself, are as follows: Respondent Petroleum Company operated a certain property consisting of several pumping plants, for the production of oil. Petitioner was employed at one of the pumping plants, his rating or position being that of fireman. He was in charge of this particular pumping plant during one shift in each 24 hours, his period of duty being from 4 p. m. to 12 midnight. Other men had charge of the plant on shifts covering the remainder of each day. In the discharge of his duty, or, rather, in awaiting the necessity for a performance of it, petitioner sat on a bench in a small box-like structure known as the "dog house," provided by the employer. Petitioner made the following statements in his testimony:

> "I was watching boilers, watching a flowing well and pumps. I was hired to watch these boilers and flowing wells and look out for everything around there, such as tools, and to order anybody off the property that came around there that was not working there. * * * These boilers were to make steam for the pumps and for rotary drilling, but they were not drilling at this time. * * * Q. How far were you from any of the other buildings of the company? A. I should think about half a mile. Q. You say that in addition to watching the plant and the flowing well you also had to watch and guard tools and implements? * * * A. Yes; the men that were working around there putting in pipe lines would bring their tools up to the dog house, and I would watch them. Q. They would turn > them over to you, and you would watch them to see that they were not taken away maliciously? A. Yes. * * * Q. Were you the only employee of the company engaged in guarding the company property at this place? A. Yes. * * * Q. Did you have firearms in this dog house? A. No, sir."

Petitioner was injured at night at the dog house mentioned in his testimony. The structure was by the side of a well-traveled road. Petitioner testified as follows:

> "I was sitting in this little dog house, and two shots were fired, one hitting in my arm and the other in the side and through the kidney. After they were fired, I looked up and saw two men with masks on standing there. I stood up and held up my hands, and they came in and looked through my pockets and took what money I had and left. * * * Q. These men that appeared in front of this dog house and commanded you to hold up your hands, were they masked? A. Yes. Q. Did they take anything other than the $20 and some odd cents that you had on your person? A. No."

It is contended by respondents that the injuries of petitioner did not arise out of his employment under respondent petroleum company, and this is the theory upon which respondent accident commission made its award. The award must, of course, stand if there is in the record any substantial evidence which supports the findings upon which it is based. We think such evidence is found in the testimony of petitioner, which is above quoted. Under that evidence petitioner's case is not like those of watchmen who are injured in endeavoring to protect the money or other property of persons who employ them to watch such money or property and to protect it from theft. It is evident from the facts that the assault upon petitioner was purely personal to him and was not engendered because of any desire upon the part of the marauders to molest the property of petitioner's employer. The assault was but an ordinary case of holdup, and, so far as the liability of the employer to make compensation is concerned, might as well have occurred on the road near the dog house, or out in the open country, or on the streets of the nearest city. The criminals were after the contents of petitioner's pockets, nothing more, and when they had taken what he had they decamped. Petitioner was not entitled to compensation. No cases are cited to us like the present, but our views receive a general support from Schmoll v. Weisbrod & Hess Brewing Co., 89 N. J. Law, 150, 97 Atl. 723, and State v. District Court, 140 Minn. 470, 168 N. W. 555, 15 A. L. R. 579.

Award affirmed.

SCHNEIDER et ux. v. HENLEY et al.
(Civ. 4174.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 25, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 21, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑171(1)—Plaintiff cannot change theory of case on appeal.

Plaintiffs cannot change the theory of their case on appeal.

2. Corporations 🔑121(1)—Buyer rescinding sale of stock could not recover from third parties, among whom seller divided money received from buyer.

A buyer of stock, seeking rescission of the sale, may not recover against third parties between whom the seller divided the money he received from the buyer.

3. Contracts 🔑270(1)—Party discovering fraud and aware of his right to rescind must act promptly.

To take advantage of the remedy afforded by Civ. Code § 1691, subd. 1, to rescind a sale, a party must act immediately when he discovers the facts which entitle him to rescind, and he is aware of his right.

4. Notice 🔑6—Notice of facts putting man on inquiry equivalent to knowledge which inquiry would disclose.

Notice of facts and circumstances which would put a man of ordinary prudence and intelligence on inquiry is equivalent to knowledge of all of the facts a reasonably diligent inquiry would disclose.

5. Corporations 🔑121(3)—Buyer failing to rescind purchase of stock for several months after discovery of fraud held guilty of laches.

Where a buyer of stock took no steps to rescind the sale until several months from the time he was entitled to rescind, held that, under Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 1, he was guilty of laches where the delay was not excused.

6. Corporations 🔑117—Buyer could not rescind sale of stock on ground of seller's representations, where buyer did not rely on them.

Where, in purchasing stock, a buyer did not rely on the representations of the seller but on other considerations, he could not rescind the sale on the ground of the seller's representations.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Emil Schneider and wife against Joseph D. Henley and others. From a judgment of nonsuit in favor of named defendant and Leo Schoenfeld, and from a judgment for defendant R. T. Shannon, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Jos. A. Sanford, and Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Aaron Sapiro, Milton D. Sapiro, Sapiro & Levy, James M. Thomas, and Abram M. Marks, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

ST. SURE, J. This is an action to rescind a sale of shares of stock in a mining corporation, upon the ground of fraud, and to recover from defendants the sum of $1,000, the price paid for the stock, with interest.

Plaintiffs appeal from a judgment of nonsuit in favor of defendants Henley and Schoenfeld, and also from a judgment in favor of defendant Shannon. The two appeals were consolidated for hearing by order of this court.

Plaintiffs, in asking for a reversal, say, at the outset, that they rely upon the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Beeman v. Richardson, 185 Cal. 280, 196 Pac. 774. An effort is made to draw a parallel between the case cited and the one before us. We cannot see it. The facts and circumstances of these cases are dissimilar. The evidence here shows that defendant Shannon was the owner of 5,000 shares of the capital stock of the United Metals Company, a Nevada corporation; that the stock had formerly been owned by one Blum and had been by him deposited in the office of one Emanuel, a stock broker; that defendant Henley was employed as a bookkeeper in Emanuel's office and knew about the stock; that defendant Schoenfeld had theretofore been employed as a bookkeeper by Emanuel; that defendant Henley had known all of the parties to the action for several years, and that he had become acquainted with Schneider while in Emanuel's office, and by reason of the fact that Schneider had been a client of the latter; that defendant Shannon desired to sell the stock, and Henley suggested names of persons who might buy, among them that of plaintiff Schneider; that Schoenfeld, who, like Henley, had met Schneider in Emanuel's office, introduced Shannon to Schneider, and a sale of the stock was effected.

Schneider testified that he had known both Schoenfeld and Henley about eight years, but that he had never met Shannon "until he was brought into my place of business in July, 1918." Shannon represented that the mine was a valuable producing one; that the ore from the mine was then being shipped and sold at a profit; that Emanuel was about to become president of the United Metals Company; that the stock offered was treasury stock of the company, had a value of 20 cents a share and was then selling in the eastern markets at that figure.

"Mr. Schoenfeld told me that Mr. Henley had some stock and knew all about the affair," testified Schneider. "He told me I should go down there and get some more information and ask them how good it was. The next day I went down, but I did not go down to see Mr. Henley on the question, but I went to see Mr. Emanuel. Mr. Emanuel happened to be sick, so I spoke to Mr. Henley and asked him about the matter. I said, 'Mr. Schoenfeld sent me down to see about the stock, you were interested and had stock too?' He said, 'Yes,' and he gave me some information about the stock. * * * What made me buy the stock, Mr. Henley told me that Mr. Emanuel was interested in the company, and he was to be president. Of course, I thought if Mr. Emanuel was interested in the affair it must be good."

Upon cross-examination Schneider further testified:

"I knew Mr. Emanuel and relied upon him very much for advice. I relied upon him when I bought real estate and when I bought stock I relied upon him. At the time Mr. Henley told me of the information he had, he told me it was obtained from Mr. Price, and when I received those certificates of stock, I saw the name of Mr. Price written there. I didn't write to Mr. Price."

Emanuel testified, in part, as follows:

"I have had the stock in my possession. It belonged to Mr. Blum and some of his friends. I had a conversation with Mr. Henley in regard to the United Metals Company stock at the time it was in my possession—I think it was in May, 1918. Mr. Blum at that time asked me to hold the stock in escrow, and I gave the stock to Mr. Henley to put in the safe. Mr. Henley was present at the conversation—what I mean, he wrote out the agreement, at the time Mr. Henley put it in the safe—he said that the stock was very low, that he bought it as a friend of Mr. Sanford, and that he would like to dispose of it, and that he had given some one an option, and I was to hold it in escrow, and Mr. Henley remarked that he could sell it too."

Defendant Henley testified, in part, as follows:

"I had a conversation with Mr. Shannon possibly a month before the stock was sold to Mr. Schneider, and also with Mr. Schoenfeld, probably a month. I possibly suggested the name of Mr. Schneider as a buyer of that stock. I could not testify positively whether I did or not. I suggested other names. Mr. Shannon asked if I had a purchaser for the stock and asked if I knew any one who would invest, and I told him I thought I had. I did not know the value of the property and don't know now. I think it is a valuable stock today. I did not tell Mr. Schoenfeld and Mr. Shannon they could refer Mr. Schneider to me for information. Mr. Schneider came to the office when Mr. Emanuel was sick. * * * He wanted to know if I knew anything about the property Mr. Shannon was selling or anything about the property of the United Metals Company, that Mr. Schoenfeld and Mr. Shannon had been up there a day or two before, and he come to see me about it. I had 6,000 or 8,000 shares of stock in it at the time, and I told him that I heard some mining engineers who had come in to see Mr. Emanuel and said it was a wonderful piece of property—the best piece of property around there. And I found out from others. I will tell that to Mr. Schneider to-day."

[1] The action is for rescission. The trial was had on the theory presented by the pleadings, that the stock was the property of the three defendants and was sold to plaintiffs by defendants. The court, as we have seen, granted a nonsuit as to defendants Henley and Schoenfeld. The stock was owned and sold by Shannon. Plaintiffs urge, for the first time, upon this court, that the sale was made pursuant to a plan formulated and carried out by the three defendants. When plaintiff Schneider was being examined in the court below by his counsel, the record shows the following occurred:

> "Q. Now go ahead and tell everything that Mr. Schoenfeld said or Mr. Shannon said to you.
> "Mr. Sapiro: We object to anything Mr. Shannon said on this occasion.
> "The Court: I will let you do this: I will let you conduct the inquiry along very broad lines, simply because you rely upon fraud and conspiracy on the part of the defendants; and of course you can't do it all at one time; and then later I can perhaps determine what the fraud or conspiracy was, if any was committed, and by whom.
> "Mr. Glensor: I don't claim conspiracy, your honor."

[2] Plaintiffs cannot change the theory of their case on appeal. Blanc v. Connor, 167 Cal. 719, 726, 141 Pac. 217; Merrill v. Kohlberg, 29 Cal. App. 382, 387, 155 Pac. 824. And, while the profits of the enterprise were divided between the three defendants, the evidence clearly establishes the fact that Shannon bought the stock from Blum, sold it to Schneider, received Schneider's check therefor and himself divided the money. It would seem that plaintiffs' right, under the theory of the case first adopted by them, was to recover their money from the seller of the stock to whom it had been paid. They could not recover against third parties. Bosley v. Monahan, 137 Iowa, 650, 112 N. W. 1102; Wright v. Day, 59 Misc. Rep. 76; 111 N. Y. Supp. 1105.

[3-5] Plaintiff Schneider testified that he ascertained the true facts concerning the representations made about December 1, 1919. "From August, 1918, until I went to see Mr. Emanuel, approximately the latter part of November, or the first of December, 1919, I did not do anything with reference to the stock," testified Schneider. "I made no inquiries, I merely placed the stock somewhere and left it by itself." On June 3, 1920, about 6 months later, plaintiffs took steps to rescind the sale. Subdivision 1 of section 1691 of the Civil Code requires prompt action in case of rescission. To take advantage of this remedy a party must act immediately when he discovers the facts which entitle him to rescind and he is aware of his right to rescission. Maginess v. Western Securities Corp., 38 Cal. App. 56, 59, 175 Pac. 277. Notice of facts and circumstances which would put a man of ordinary prudence and intelligence on inquiry is, in the eyes of the law, equivalent to knowledge of all the facts a reasonably diligent inquiry would disclose. Garstang v. Skinner, 165 Cal. 721, 727, 134 Pac. 329. It appears from the complaint that plaintiffs had actual knowledge of the fraud and of their right to rescind several months before suit was brought. Defendants in their answer allege laches on the part of plaintiffs as a bar to their right to rescind. In Marten v. Burns Wine Co., 99 Cal. 355, 33 Pac. 1107, it was held that a delay of 3 months was too long. In the case of Bailey v. Fox, 78 Cal. 389, 20 Pac. 868, a delay of 4 months was held to be fatal, and in Gamble v. Tripp, 99 Cal. 223, 227, 33 Pac. 851, the Supreme Court said that a delay of 4½ months, in the absence of some excuse shown therefor, was certainly not the prompt action required by the Code. From an examination of authorities, it would appear that 30 days is about the utmost length of time which the courts are disposed to allow to the purchaser for rescission, unless there are unusual circumstances in the case excusing longer delay. 2 Black on Rescission and Cancellation, § 542, p. 1279. There was no relation of confidence induced or existing between the plaintiffs and defendants, and nothing at all which would excuse plaintiffs for failure to obey the mandatory provisions of the statute relative to rescission after discovery of the fraud. Plaintiffs neither alleged nor proved any excuse in justification of their long delay in rescinding, and under the law they were guilty of laches.

[6] In its judgment in favor of defendant Shannon, the trial court found that certain representations, hereinbefore mentioned, were made by him, but, in this connection, further found:

> "It is not true that the plaintiffs then and there or at all relied on the inducements or representations found to have been made, nor did said representations induce plaintiffs to part with anything whatever of value, nor were they deceived or misled by any said representations, nor did plaintiffs act upon any of said representations to their detriment, nor did they part with anything of value because of said representations."

In view of what we have said upon the subject of laches, we deem it unnecessary to enter into a critical discussion as to whether or not the evidence is sufficient to support the judgment of the trial court. Suffice it to say, we have carefully read the record, and our impression is that the conclusion reached by the able trial judge is right. Plaintiff Schneider testified that he did not buy the stock upon any statements or representations made to him by defendant Shannon. He bought the stock because he thought Emanuel was a stockholder in the company, and if the investment was good enough for Emanuel it was good enough for him.

For the reasons given, the judgment of nonsuit in favor of both of the defendants Henley and Schoenfeld, and also the judgment in favor of defendant Shannon, are affirmed.

WATSON v. DUARTE. (Civ. 4447.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 1, 1923.)

1. Brokers 🔑65(6)—Stipulation to release broker for responsibility for fraud inducing contract not binding.

Where a contract to pay a broker's commission for the exchange of real property was obtained by fraudulent misrepresentations on the part of the broker, a stipulation therein releasing the broker from all responsibility for representations or statements made was not binding on the purchaser.

2. Brokers 🔑65(6)—Owner not estopped to set up broker's fraud because of release.

That an owner, induced by fraudulent misrepresentation, stipulating for the exchange of his property, released the broker and the other party from all liability for misrepresentations, does not bring the case within the doctrine of estoppel, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3, providing that one who has led another to believe a particular thing to be true, and to act on such belief, cannot be permitted to falsify his declaration or act relied on, and therefore the owner can set up the broker's fraud as a defense to an action for commission.

3. Brokers 🔑54—Broker entitled to commission, without proof of ability of purchaser to complete transaction.

Where a broker's contract to procure an exchange of property stipulated that he should be entitled to his commission on the acceptance of the agreement by the other party, he was entitled to his commission when the contract was accepted, irrespective of the ability of the second party to complete the exchange.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by B. J. Watson against M. G. Duarte to recover commissions due under a contract for exchange of real property. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. C. Saylor, of Fresno, for appellant.

Briggs & Sorensen, and W. P. Thompson, all of Fresno, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to recover the sum of $612.50 on a written contract executed by the defendant, whereby the plaintiff and his assignor were employed as real estate brokers to exchange a piece of real property owned by the defendant for certain real property owned by one D. Sirkegian. By the terms of the contract the commission was agreed to be paid upon the acceptance of the terms and conditions of the exchange by the said Sirkegian. The contract contained a waiver of the defendant's right to attack the contract upon the ground of misrepresentation in its execution, which read as follows:

> "It is further understood and agreed that we have investigated and examined the property last above herein described, know the value thereof, and hereby release said J. O. Kerrick and B. J. Watson from all responsibility and liability for representations or statements as to the same."

The plaintiff sued in the usual form for the recovery of the amount stipulated to be paid in the contract. As a special defense the answer alleged that defendant's signature to the contract was secured by false and fraudulent representations on the part of plaintiff, consisting in (1) a representation that the land was worth $40,000 and would readily sell for same on the market; that the plaintiff then had a sale ready and waiting at said price of $40,000, whereas in truth and in fact the land was not worth over $25,000, and that it had been frequently priced at said sum around the time of the execution of the agreement; (2) that plaintiff represented that there were 1,500 peach trees on the premises, whereas there were but 900; that there were 14 acres of Muscat grapes, whereas there were only 11 acres of Muscat grapes; that there were 12 acres of Thompson grapes, whereas there were only 2 acres of Thompson grapes; (3) that said land was clear from alkali, whereas it was in fact situated in an alkali district and contained alkali; (4) that the yield from said crop on said ranch was $6,000 a year, whereas the yield therefrom was in fact less than $2,000 a year; (5) that said land was level, whereas in truth it is rough and uneven. Upon this issue it was further alleged that the defendant was crippled, and was therefore unable to examine the land; that he went with the plaintiff to see a small portion of the land near the house, and relied solely upon the representations of the plaintiff with reference to the property; that he was unable to read or write the English language; that he had never read the contract, nor had any one else read the same to him, but that he executed it, relying upon the friendship of plaintiff for himself and his family and on the further representation of plaintiff that it would not bind him to trade his property, unless he so desired.

The trial court found in favor of plaintiff upon all the allegations of his complaint, and specifically found that all the allegations above referred to as constituting fraudulent misrepresentations were not true. These findings, so far as they relate to the defense of fraud are not supported by any evidence, as the trial court consistently refused to permit any evidence to be received upon that issue.

On this appeal this action of the trial court is assigned as error, and the further point is made that the judgment is erroneous, because respondent failed to show that he had obtainer a party ready, able and willing to exchange the property in question.

On the first point it appears that the appellant offered to prove all the allegations of misrepresentation contained in his answer, but the offer was objected to on the ground that the appellant had specifically contracted with reference thereto, and that he must be deemed to have waived in the agreement itself all claim of false and fraudulent misrepresentations incident to its execution. The question was propounded to appellant's witness (the daughter of the appellant):

> "Did Mr. Watson make any representations to you or to your father? A. Yes; he did. Q. About the ranch? A. Yes; he did. Q. What did he tell you about it?"

Hereupon objection was made by counsel for respondent upon the ground that the evidence was inadmissible by reason of the stipulation in the contract above referred to. This objection was sustained, and all other offers of proof were rejected.

[1] It seems to be the position of respondent that the case rests upon the question whether appellant was aware of the stipulation in the contract. No attempt is made to defend this stipulation. Assuming that the appellant had full knowledge of all the terms of the contract, and was aware of the fact that this stipulation prevented him from raising the defense of fraud in this action, the issue, nevertheless, is whether such a stipulation in a contract is valid. In American National Bank v. Sommerville, 64 Cal. Dec. 393, 395,[1] the Supreme Court, in a case involving a similar stipulation in a contract for the sale of an automobile, said:

> "It has also been repeatedly held that, if one be fraudulently induced to enter into a contract and to execute it, he is not bound by a stipulation or concluding clause of the same against setting up the fraud. If the instrument be void for fraud in its execution, the stipulation has no more binding force than if the contract had no existence, or were a mere piece of paper. J. A. Fay & Egan Co. v. Independent Lumber Co., 178 Ala. 166, 168. 'It would be carrying this doctrine [estoppel] to a preposterous extent to hold that a party is estopped from claiming that the very instrument claimed to estop him was obtained from him by fraud.' Wilcox v. Howell, 44 N. Y. 398, 402."

The Supreme Court granted a rehearing in that case, and it is now pending before it, so that it is not now authority. However, the language quoted is appropriate and the authorities therein cited fully support the rule announced. Here the answer alleged that the appellant had been fraudulently induced to enter into the contract and to execute it. He cannot therefore be bound by a stipulation which was itself obtained by fraud.

[2] The case does not come within the doctrine of estoppel as defined by subdivision 3 of section 1962 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads:

> "Whenever a party has, by his own declaration, act, or omission, intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true, and to act upon such belief, he cannot, in any litigation arising out of such declaration, act, or omission, be permitted to falsify it."

The respondent was not led to believe anything to be true by any statement which the appellant made, and he did not act upon the belief that the alleged misrepresentations were true because the appellant stipulated to release him from liability therefor. The offer of the appellant to prove that he was induced to execute the contract by false and fraudulent representations on the part of the respondent was therefore an offer to prove a triable issue in the case, and its rejection by the trial court was error.

[3] There is no merit in appellant's contention that the respondent was not entitled to recover the agreed commission until he produced a party ready, able, and willing to make an exchange of the properties involved. The contract provided that the respondent should be entitled to payment of his commission upon the acceptance of the agreement. Proof was made that the agreement was accepted in accordance with the terms of the contract. The commission was then due irrespective of the ability of the second party to complete the exchange. Jauman v. McCusick, 166 Cal. 517, 521, 522, 137 Pac. 254.

Judgment reversed.

[1] Rehearing granted.

2. Appeal and error 🔑931(4)—Assumed, in support of refusal to compel entry of satisfaction of judgment applied on judgment debtors' judgments against judgment creditor, that court found latter had no interest applicable to such judgments.

On appeal from an order denying a motion to compel entry of satisfaction of a judgment, on payment of the difference between the amount thereof and sums allowed appellants in satisfaction of judgments against appellee, whose judgment against appellants had been applied to satisfaction of their judgments, after appellee's assignment of his judgment to a bank, which intervened, it must be assumed, in support of the order, that the court found, as alleged by the bank, that appellee had no interest in his judgment which could be so applied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by M. A. Murphy against E. M. Davids and others, in which the San Bernardino National Bank intervened. Judgment for plaintiff affirmed (181 Cal. 706, 186 Pac. 143), and, from an order denying a motion to compel entry of satisfaction thereof, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Abrahams, Moore & D'Orr, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Byron Waters, of San Bernardino, Anderson & Anderson, and Victor T. Watkins, all of Los Angeles, and Ralph E. Swing, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from an order denying a motion to compel the entry of satisfaction of judgment.

Briefly, the facts of the case are that on November 17, 1916, plaintiff Murphy obtained a judgment against the defendants Davids and Lindsay in the sum of $15,000 for malicious prosecution. An appeal from said judgment was noticed on the 24th day of November, 1916, and the judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court on December 17, 1919. 181 Cal. 706, 186 Pac. 143. Immediately following the notice of appeal and on the 27th of November, 1916, the plaintiff Murphy assigned the whole of said judgment as follows: An undivided one-fourth to his attorneys, Anderson & Anderson; an undivided one-third to the San Bernardino National Bank; and the remainder to his wife. Though notice of this assignment was not personally served upon the defendants, the assignment was filed with the county clerk and placed among the papers in the case. On the 19th of January, 1920, at the time when the remittitur in the original case was issued, the defendants Lindsay and Davids took from the owners thereof assignments of four several judgments rendered in the superior court in San Francisco county against Murphy, the plaintiff in this action. These judgments then aggregated, with interest, something over $16,000. On the 21st day of January, 1920, following, the defendants herein were personally served with notice that the entire judgment in the original case had been assigned by the plaintiff Murphy to the San Bernardino National Bank, the intervener herein. On the 31st day of January, 1920, defendants herein gave notice of a motion to offset the four San Francisco judgments against the judgment in this action. This motion was duly heard before the superior court in Los Angeles county and was denied on the 14th of August, 1920. An appeal from the order denying said motion was taken by the defendants herein to the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, and on November 29, 1921, said order was by that court affirmed. 203 Pac. 802. A petition for a transfer of said cause to the Supreme Court was in due time denied, and the remittitur upon said appeal was handed down and filed in this case on February 1, 1922. Immediately thereafter, and on the 6th day of February, 1922, these defendants appeared before the superior court in San Francisco county upon an ex parte motion in each of the four San Francisco actions in which they held the assigned judgments "for an order of this court to apply certain property of the judgment debtor, M. A. Murphy, herein to the satisfaction of the judgment herein." Thereupon the superior court of San Francisco county made its order in each of these four actions ordering "that the said property of the said M. A. Murphy, to wit, said judgment rendered in the superior court of Los Angeles county," be applied to the payment of the judgment in said action, "and that the amount so applied be and the same hereby is credited upon said judgment in favor of said M. A. Murphy." The amount of the Los Angeles judgment against the defendants Davids and Lindsay at that time had accrued, with the interest, to something over $20,000. The difference between the sums allowed in satisfaction of the San Francisco judgments was by these defendants paid to the county clerk of Los Angeles county, with instructions to apply the same upon the Los Angeles judgment and enter satisfaction in full. This having been refused, the defendants noticed their motion in this case for an order compelling the entry of satisfaction of the judgment herein. The motion was denied and this appeal is prosecuted from the order denying the same.

[1] In support of their appeal these appellants argue that the San Francisco orders crediting the portion of the Los Angeles judgment in payment of the San Francisco judgments are final and conclusive orders in each of the four San Francisco cases and are not subject to attack in a collateral way in this proceeding pending in Los Angeles county. But it is to be noted that in each of the four orders made by the San Francisco court the property of the judgment debtor M. A. Murphy was alone involved. The notice of motion specifically called for an order to apply the property of that judgment debtor, and the order related solely to the application of his property. In none of the San Francisco cases did that court endeavor to determine the question of Murphy's ownership of any property, and, of course, the San Francisco court did not attempt to determine any existing rights in the Los Angeles judgment. Naturally, this could not have been done without first giving to the claimants thereof their day in court. The effect of the orders of the San Francisco court is, therefore, that whatever property the judgment debtor M. A. Murphy had in the Los Angeles judgment, and that property alone, was to be applied in satisfaction of the four several judgments in the San Francisco actions.

[2] When, therefore, these four orders were presented to the Los Angeles court on the motion which is now before us, one of the questions presented to that court was: What property did M. A. Murphy have in the Los Angeles judgment which was to be applied in satisfaction of the San Francisco judgments? This issue was squarely joined by the answer of the intervener, San Bernardino National Bank, and, in support of the order of the superior court denying the motion, it must be assumed that the court found the facts alleged by the intervener to be true and that Murphy had no interest in said judgment which could be applied in satisfaction of the San Francisco judgments. But, irrespective of any hearing on this motion, the precise question was finally determined by the same court in its order of August 14, 1920, when it denied the motion to offset the San Francisco judgments against the judgment in this case.

REMPEL v. KELLS et al. (Civ. 4492.)

1. Brokers 🔑65(5), 72—Not entitled to credit for cost of alterations and repairs after fraudulent transfer to agent, nor to commission on resale after wrongfully taking title in themselves.

Brokers employed only to negotiate a sale of realty held not entitled to credit for expenditures in making alterations and repairs, after they fraudulently caused title to be vested in their agent, nor to a commission on a resale to others, after they wrongfully took title in themselves.

2. Brokers 🔑38(4)—Brokers fraudulently selling to themselves and reselling at advanced price, without informing owner, presumed to have acted with intent to defraud.

Brokers fraudulently selling property to themselves and reselling it at an advanced price for their own advantage, without informing the owner, need not be shown to have acted with intent to defraud her, such act being unlawful in itself (Pen. Code, §§ 115, 470), and hence presumed to have been done with an unlawful intent (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 2).

3. Brokers 🔑31—Brokers wrongfully taking title and reselling for secret profits held precluded from asserting right to accept transfer from purchaser declining to take property.

Brokers executing a receipt for an amount deposited as part payment on property intrusted to them for sale, but claiming that they received a check, payment of which was stopped, cannot contend, in the owner's action for secret profits made by them on a resale, after wrongfully taking title in themselves, that when the original purchaser declined to take the property they could accept a transfer from her, in the absence of evidence that she ever in good faith entered into a contract to purchase.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Florence Rempel against H. R. Kells and C. W. Grant, copartners under the firm name of Kells & Grant, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Farrand & Slosson, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Cornelius M. Enns and M. G. Ferrahain, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff, as principal, commenced an action to recover a judgment for secret profits against the defendants as her agents. The plaintiff had judgment in the trial court, and the defendants have appealed.

The trial court made findings which are not challenged, except as hereinafter stated. The findings refer to certain documents which are pleaded in haec verba in the complaint. For the purpose of brevity, we have substituted the document for general reference, and, without making any other changes, the findings tell the following story:

"That the defendants H. R. Kells and C. W. Grant are, and at all the times hereinafter mentioned were, copartners, and as such doing business as realtors in the city of Los Angeles in said county and state, under the firm name of Kells & Grant. That William Huntting Cooper and Harvey Crane at all the times herein mentioned were salesmen and agents of said firm in their said business. That defendant Annabel Grant is the sister of said C. W. Grant, and is, and at all times herein mentioned was, the agent and assistant of said firm, and that Lulu B. Cooper is the wife of said William Huntting Cooper.

"That on the 3d day of February, 1920, the plaintiff consulted said Kells & Grant, experienced real estate men of her neighborhood, regarding the value and selling of her then home and residence property, 527 South Hobart Boulevard in the city of Los Angeles in said county and state, who then examined said property, estimated its selling value at $18,000, and entered into a written agreement with her to find a purchaser for her in 30 days, which agreement fixed the minimum price at $15,000, plus $750 as commission to said agents.

"That after the expiration of said 30 days said Kells & Grant continued as agents for the sale of said property by mutual consent. That during said agency said Kells & Grant and their said salesman Cooper submitted to plaintiff the offer of one customer to buy said property for $15,000, which plaintiff declined, and on April 1, 1920, the day before plaintiff's departure for her new home in Vermont, urged her to approve and sign an agreement for the purchase of said property at $14,000, made by them with Elizabeth F. Davies as buyer. That plaintiff then yielded, approved, and signed said agreement to sell at such reduced price and to pay said Kells & Grant a commission of $700 out of the proceeds of such sale, then also signed and acknowledged a grant deed and other papers prepared by her said agents to be used in such sale, intrusted said deed and papers to her said agents, to be used by them in the consummation of said sale, and thereupon departed for Vermont.

"That, after plaintiff's departure, the said buyer Elizabeth F. Davies, discovering that there was a dispute with regard to the division of said commission between said Kells & Grant and an agent who had first showed her said property from the list of said Kells & Grant, and fearing a lawsuit, on the 5th day of April, 1920, stopped the payment of her $500 check given to the order of said Kells & Grant as initial payment on her said contract, never received her copy of said contract, and repudiated said contract, so notifying said Kells & Grant, who, in the name of the plaintiff and as her agents, acquiesced and canceled said contract, and on the 29th day of April, 1920, telegraphed the plaintiff as follows:

"'Sorry to report that your deal is not yet closed. Original buyer failed to consummate. We have resold, and deal will close within next few days. Kells & Grant.'

"That on May 1, 1920, while the absent plaintiff was waiting for a report of the price and terms of said resale, having complete confidence in her said agents to care for her interest, the said Kells & Grant, without knowledge of plaintiff and in violation of their said agency and in fraud of plaintiff's interests, with the deliberate aid of their said agents Harvey Crane, Annabel Grant, and Wm. Huntting Cooper, and of the latter's wife, Lulu B. Cooper, sold said property to themselves and said Annabel Grant, to own and use said property and sell the same at an advanced price for their own advantage, and they accomplished such sale to themselves and concealed the same from plaintiff, as found below.

"That, upon failure of said Davies contract, said Kells & Grant, in conference with their escrow clerk, decided not to write to plaintiff and not to ask her for the deed to a new customer, but to alter the deed made for said Elizabeth Davies, which plaintiff had intrusted to them, and thereupon caused the name of Elizabeth F. Davies to be erased from said deed and the names of their said salesman Wm. Huntting Cooper and his wife, Lulu B. Cooper, to be inserted as grantees in said deed, although said Coopers never obligated themselves to buy said property nor paid anything to make such purchase.

"That said Coopers on May 1, 1920, executed their grant deed to Annabel Grant, conveying said property of plaintiff, and delivered such deed to defendants Kells & Grant and Annabel Grant.

"That defendants Kells & Grant and Annabel Grant then placed said altered deed to the Coopers and said deed from the Coopers to Annabel Grant in one escrow with the Title Insurance & Trust Company, Los Angeles, Cal., supplied for such escrow the funds needed for a sale of said property at the price of $14,000, and at the closing of said escrow, received said deeds and under them took, managed, used, and enjoyed said property as their own.

"That defendants never reported to plaintiff the price and particulars of the resale mentioned in their said telegram, nor did they report to her any of the facts found above in this paragraph, except that they, after such successful destruction and appropriation of plaintiff's legal title to said property, caused said title company to send to plaintiff an escrow statement, as follows:

"'Escrow Statement of Florence Rempel. Escrow No. 160549.

"'In account with Title Insurance & Trust Company.

"'In Escrow with Kells & Grant.

"And caused said title company to disburse said $14,000 and the unearned insurance premium of $42.98, in accordance with said escrow statement as follows: For title certificate, escrow fee, rev. stamps, insur. transf., $79; to Kells & Grant as commission, $700; to plaintiff the balance of said $14,042.98, to wit, $13,263.98.

"That on the 29th day of June, 1920, said defendants Kells & Grant and Annabel Grant, without knowledge of plaintiff, in violation of law and in breach of the trust imposed on them by the law in favor of plaintiff, sold and conveyed said property as their own property to Rudolph C. Fritz and Lena Fritz, his wife, for the consideration of $19,000, delivering to said buyers the deed of said Annabel Grant, the holder of the record title, dated June 29, 1920, and recorded July 19, 1920, and the said buyers, having no notice of plaintiff's rights in said property, have paid the whole of said consideration to said defendants.

"That plaintiff, in May, 1920, received and retained said remittance in the belief that her said agents had faithfully represented her and had obtained for her the best customer and the best price obtainable. That plaintiff has had little experience in real estate transactions. That she did not suspect or learn that her said deed had been altered until January, 1921, and did not learn the said facts resulting in the transfer of her said property to the defendants and in its later transfer to said Fritz and wife until March, 1921. That she then demanded an explanation and settlement from said Kells & Grant, who answered that they had taken over said property for themselves and denied any liability to plaintiff.

"That plaintiff has elected as the measure of her damages caused by defendants the proceeds of said sale to Fritz and wife with interest thereon, under section 2237 of the Civil Code.

"That at the time of such taking over by defendants, said property was in good and saleable condition, was not in need of repairs or alterations. That said defendants did not expend $2,500 or any other sum in repairing and altering said property. That defendants did not pay $950 or any sum as real estate broker's commission on such sale to Fritz and wife, and that the expenses for title certificate, revenue stamps, and fees attending such transfer to said Fritz and wife did not exceed the sum of $85.96."

[1] The appellants complain because the trial court, in framing its judgment, did not credit the appellants with amounts claimed to have been expended by the appellants in making alterations and repairs. It will be noted that the appellants caused the title to be vested in their agent under a deed dated May 1, 1920. They offered no evidence at the trial showing that any repairs were made prior to that date. The appellants were employed to negotiate a sale. The respondent never at any time conferred on the appellants any authority to make alterations or repairs. Any expenditures made by the appellants for the account of the respondent after May 1, 1920, were made by the appellants as volunteers. The same claim is made by the appellants regarding a commission on the sale to Mr. and Mrs. Fritz, but it appears that the sale was made nearly 60 days after the appellants had wrongfully taken title in themselves.

[2] The appellants further contend that the record does not show that they acted with intent to defraud the respondent, but the act of the appellants was in itself unlawful. Pen. Code, §§ 115 and 470. It is presumed that an unlawful act was done with an unlawful intent. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 2.

[3] The appellants contend that when Mrs. Davies declined to take the property they had the right to accept a transfer to themselves from Mrs. Davies. A complete answer is that Mrs. Davies never executed a transfer. When the sale was negotiated, the appellants executed to Mrs. Davies a receipt that they had "received from Elizabeth F. Davies the sum of $500 as deposit and part payment. * * *" They now claim that they received a check, and that the payment of the check was stopped, etc. It is not made to appear, and probably the trial court did not accept as a fact, that Mrs. Davies ever in good faith entered into a contract to purchase.

The record shows no error, and the judgment is affirmed.

1. Highways 🔑183—That plaintiff, injured in automobile collision, did not have operator's license, did not bar recovery.

In an action to recover damages for a head-on collision on a highway between defendant's automobile, traveling on the left-hand side of the road, and plaintiff's automobile, that plaintiff did not have an operator's license did not deprive him of the right of recovery; such fact having nothing to do with the collision.

2. Appeal and error 🔑909(1)—Supreme Court will assume that automobile lights complied with statute, in view of judgment.

In an action for damages from collision between defendant's automobile, traveling on the left-hand side of the road, and plaintiff's automobile, defendant claiming that his agent, driving the car, was blinded by the automobile lights of plaintiff's machine, held, in the absence of evidence that such lights did not comply with the statute, the Supreme Court, in view of a judgment for plaintiff, will assume that they did.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by L. Page against M. H. Mayors. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. R. Simon, and H. L. Welch, both of El Centro, for appellant.

Harry G. Sadicoff, of Los Angeles, and H. H. Myers, of Calipatria, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action in which the plaintiff sought to recover damages for a head-on collision, occurring upon a public highway between an automobile operated by defendant's agent, traveling on the left-hand side of the road, and plaintiff's automobile. The trial court found in favor of the plaintiff that there was no contributory negligence, and that the defendant was guilty of negligence and awarded damages in the sum of $425, although the plaintiff had claimed $10,000 damages. The defendant appeals, and claims that the judgment is erroneous, for the reason that the evidence shows that the plaintiff did not have an operator's license at the time of the collision and that the defendant's agent was blinded by the automobile lights of the plaintiff's machine.

[1] With reference to the question of the operator's license, it is sufficient to say that it had nothing to do with the collision. We are not disposed to hold that the presence of the plaintiff upon the highway was unlawful, and that this was thus a proximate cause of his injuries or to deprive him of the right of recovery.

[2] As to the fact that the defendant's servant's eyes were blinded by plaintiff's lights, there is no evidence that these lights did not comply with the statute, and in view of the judgment we must assume that they did.

The judgment is affirmed.

PHILLIPS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 10729.)

Courts ⚿475(2, 3)—Court appointing general administrator authorized to require special administrator appointed by another court to account.

After a general administrator had been appointed by the superior court of one county, the jurisdiction of the estate vests in that court, and it has authority to require a special administrator appointed by the superior court of another county to account to the general administrator; hence an application by the special administrator for a writ of prohibition to prevent such an accounting will be denied.

In Bank.

Application by Frank H. Phillips, as special administrator, etc., for a writ of prohibition, prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco and Thomas F. Graham, judge thereof, to restrain the hearing of an order to show cause why the special administrator should not account. Writ denied.

Fred. S. Howell, of Petaluma, for special administrator.

PER CURIAM. This is an application by petitioner, as special administrator of the estate of Margaret Quinn Springfield, deceased, for a writ of prohibition, prayed to be directed to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and Thomas F. Graham, judge thereof, to prevent that court from proceeding with the hearing of an order directed to petitioner to show cause why he should not file an account of his administration of said estate in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco.

Following the death of Margaret Quinn Springfield, petitioner, on July 21, 1920, applied to the superior court of Sonoma county for appointment as special administrator of the estate of said deceased, and was regularly appointed and thereafter qualified, and special letters were issued to him under the seal of said court. Petitioner took into his possession and custody all of the property and estate of deceased and has ever since continued to administer the same. Subsequently to the appointment of petitioner as special administrator, a document purporting to be the last will and testament of Margaret Quinn Springfield, in which one Mary B. Farrell was named as executrix, was filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. On or about January 18, 1921, this will was admitted to probate, and Mary B. Farrell was appointed executrix thereof and letters testamentary were issued to her.

On or about May 18, 1923, petitioner filed with the county clerk as ex officio clerk of the superior court of Sonoma county, in which the special administration was pending, a verified account of his administration, praying for settlement thereof. Upon the date set for hearing of said petition, June 1, 1923, the matter was continued at the request of the attorney representing the executrix, Mary B. Farrell, and on June 2, 1923, said executrix, through her attorney, presented an affidavit and application and secured the issuance from the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, of an order and citation directed to petitioner as special administrator, to show cause why an account of his administration of said estate should not be rendered by him, filed, served, and settled in and by said superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and all of the property of said estate delivered to Mary B. Farrell as executrix of the last will and testament of Margaret Quinn Springfield.

Petitioner asks that this writ issue upon the ground that special administration proceedings now pending in the superior court of Sonoma county will be unlawfully obstructed and interfered with if the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco is permitted to proceed further with the hearing of the order to show cause.

It is the contention of petitioner that, the superior court of Sonoma county having first acquired jurisdiction of the special administration proceedings, its jurisdiction became exclusive; that its order appointing special administrator is, in the absence of appeal, conclusive and final, and cannot be impeached in any collateral proceeding; that the superior court of San Francisco is without jurisdiction and authority to require the special administrator to render account to it of his stewardship; and that prohibition is the only speedy and adequate remedy available to petitioner to restrain this attempted unauthorized exercise of jurisdiction.

The application for a writ of prohibition is denied, for the reasons stated in the concurring opinion of Justice Shaw in the case of Miller v. Superior Court of Yolo County, 186 Cal. 453, 458, 199 Pac. 805, 808.

(Supreme Court of California. June 1, 1923. Rehearing Denied June 28, 1923.)

1. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition 🔑28—Foreign taxi manufacturing company held not to have acquired rights to trade-name or slogan.

A foreign corporation engaged in the manufacture of taxicabs which had adopted a trade-name and trade slogan which it permitted corporations, organized in the various cities to operate taxicabs purchased from it to use did not acquire any rights to the exclusive appropriation of either the name or slogan in a city in which it had never engaged in business, and, therefore, could not transfer any rights to a corporation subsequently formed in that city to operate its cabs.

2. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition 🔑68—Relief against unfair competition rests upon deceit and fraud.

Relief against unfair competition by the use of trade-names other than trade-marks really rests upon the deceit or fraud which the later comer into the business field is practicing upon the earlier comer and upon the public.

3. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition 🔑73(1)—Defendant's prior use of trade-name and slogan originated by foreign corporation held not unfair competition.

Where defendants had adopted a trade-name and slogan in their taxicab business which had been originated by a foreign corporation engaged in the manufacture of taxicabs before such name and slogan were used by any one else within the locality, their continued use of the name and slogan after a local corporation had been formed which purchased its taxicabs from the foreign corporation cannot be restrained as unfair competition with the new local corporation.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action for injunction by the Yellow Cab Company of San Diego against Samuel Sachs and another, copartners doing business under the name and style of the Yellow Taxicab Company of San Diego. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Haines & Haines, of San Diego, for appellant.

A. Rosenthal, of San Diego, for respondents.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff in this action sought to have the defendants enjoined from the further use of a certain trade-name and slogan in the city of San Diego, to the use of which the plaintiff claimed to be exclusively entitled. The trial court granted the defendants' motion for a nonsuit at the close of the plaintiff's case, and thereupon ordered and entered its judgment in the defendants' favor. It is from such judgment that this appeal has been taken.

The following are the facts educed at the trial, and which for the purposes of this appeal are taken to be true: For several years prior to 1920 the Walden W. Shaw Company, a corporation having its principal place of business in Chicago, Ill., was engaged in the business of manufacturing, operating, dealing in, renting, and repairing automobiles, taxicabs, motor cars, and like vehicles for the transportation of passengers and goods. In the development of this business it came to devote its particular attention to the production of a standardized form of taxicab for urban use. In the month of August, 1920, this corporation, by proceedings duly taken, caused its name to be changed to "Yellow Cab Manufacturing Company," and devoted its attention to the manufacture wholesale of these particular cabs, organizing a subsidiary corporation for the purpose of operating a system of these taxicabs in the city of Chicago. It also extended its operations to other cities by encouraging therein the organization of local taxicab corporations or concerns to which it would sell its standardized product, to be operated upon the system adopted by it in Chicago, which involved the uniforming of drivers and their training in courtesy to the public, a particular method of keeping track of the tariffs charged and of bookkeeping generally, and, among other things, the use of a certain trade slogan invented or adopted by the parent corporation and reading: "The cab that took the tax out of taxi." The prevailing color of the taxicabs thus introduced in various communities was yellow, though other colors were employed in the larger cities where more than one subsidiary concern was put in operation. The relation between the Chicago corporation and the local corporations or concerns was not otherwise financial, the only interest of the so-called parent corporation being that of encouraging the organization of these local enterprises in order to expand its trade in its particular style of taxicab. In the month of May, 1920, a corporation was organized in Los Angeles under the name of the "Yellow Taxicab Company of Los Angeles," for the purpose of putting into operation yellow cabs in that city purchased from and under the trade-name, slogan, and system of the Chicago concern. In the meantime, and for some time prior thereto, the defendants herein had been engaged in conducting a taxicab business in the city of San Diego under the name of "Smith Taxicab Company"; but in the summer of 1920 said firm decided to change its name to "Yellow Taxicab Company of San Diego," and to operate a system of yellow cabs under said name. The firm began such operation about the 1st of September, 1920, in said city, and on October 7, 1920, adopted as its trade slogan the phrase, "The cab that takes the tax out of taxi," causing an advertisement to be inserted in the local telephone directory of their said name and slogan. They also, and in December, 1920, began advertising their business in the newspapers of said city under said name and slogan, and continued to do business thereunder until stopped by the preliminary injunction issued in this case in the latter part of January, 1921. In the meantime, and during the month of October, 1920, one M. T. Uhler began negotiations looking to the establishment of a yellow taxicab service in the city of San Diego under the system adopted and expanded by the Chicago corporation, and on the 29th day of November, 1920, caused to be filed articles of incorporation of a corporation to be known as "Yellow Taxicab Company of San Diego," to which corporation said Uhler assigned a contract which earlier in that month he had obtained from the Chicago corporation for the purchase of certain of their taxicabs. Having done this, he proceeded to finance said corporation through the sale of stock in the city of San Diego for the purpose of completing the purchase of said taxicabs and of installing said Chicago system of operation in said city. In pursuance of said purchase the corporation thus organized sought public support through advertisements inserted in the local newspapers explaining its said purposes and using the phrase adopted by the Chicago concern: "The cab that took the tax out of taxi." This corporation did not, however, actually engage in the business of operating yellow taxicabs or of using said trade slogan in connection with their said operation until the 23d day of February, 1921, when it put in operation 3 of the 26 taxicabs which had been thus ordered by and shipped to said Uhler under his contract with the Chicago concern, but which were not to be released for operation except as they were paid for. The present action was commenced by said corporation on January 24, 1921, about a month prior to the actual beginning of the operation and use of any of the plaintiff's said taxicabs or of said trade phrase or slogan in connection with their said operation and use. In its complaint herein the plaintiff set forth with much of detail the history and development of the business and system of the Chicago corporation and of its use of the trade-name, "Yellow Cab Manufacturing Company," and of the trade phrase or slogan, "It took the tax out of taxi." It also set forth in detail the activities of the said M. T. Uhler in his endeavor to introduce said system of taxicab service under said trade-name and slogan into the city of San Diego. It also set forth in its complaint the history of the activities and operation of said defendants under the firm name of "Yellow Taxicab Company of San Diego," and with the use of the trade phrase or slogan, "It takes the tax out of taxi," which acts, as plaintiff alleged, interfered with the exclusive rights which the Chicago corporation had acquired and to which the plaintiff had succeeded to the use in the said city of San Diego of said trade-name and said trade phrase or slogan. Upon filing said complaint it procured a preliminary injunction temporarily preventing the defendants from the further operation of their said business under said trade-name and by the use of said trade-phrase or slogan. Upon the trial of the cause the facts as above set forth were presented in evidence in support of the plaintiff's case, at the close of which the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which motion being granted, and judgment thereon entered, this appeal was taken.

[1, 2] It may be stated, upon the threshold of our consideration of the issues involved in this appeal, that no question relative to trade-marks or the rights to particular designations or slogans which may be acquired thereby under state or federal enactments is involved in this appeal. Neither the plaintiff nor the Chicago concern under whose encouragement it was organized had or could probably have acquired any exclusive trade-mark rights in or to the use of the name "Yellow Taxicab Company," or in or to the use of the slogan, "it took the tax out of taxi." The only rights which the plaintiff or its quasi parent, the Chicago corporation, could have or could assert in this action would be those arising out of the actual appropriation and use of such trade-name and trade-phrase or slogan in the particular locality and out of the defendants' fraudulent interference with the plaintiff's business growing out of such use through unfair competition. In so far as the Chicago corporation is concerned it is clear that it never acquired any rights in or to the exclusive appropriation of either said name or slogan through any use thereof in the city of San Diego; and, never having acquired such rights, it is plain that it neither did nor could transfer any such rights to the plaintiff herein. The law governing the use of trade-marks, trade-names, and trade-slogans is fairly well settled in this state. As to trade-marks, Civil Code, § 991, clearly defines and limits the kind of designations which may be appropriated and protected under its terms and under the provisions of the Political Code and Penal Code relating to trade-marks (Pol. Code, §§ 3196–3198; Pen. Code, §§ 350–354); and, as we have seen, the plaintiff claims no rights under these Code provisions. As to trade-names, this court, in the recent case of Dunston v. Los Angeles Van, etc., Co., 165 Cal. 89, 131 Pac. 115, has declared the principle governing the appropriation and use of trade-names other than trade-marks, and has collated the authorities supporting it as follows:

> "As the judgment cannot thus be supported upon the theory of an invasion of an exclusive right to property in a trade-mark, the only ground for the support of the judgment is that which has come to be known as 'unfair trade dealing.' This is but a succinct statement of the principle that in the interest of fair commercial dealing courts of equity, where one has been first in the field doing business under a given name, will protect that person to the extent of making competitors use reasonable precautions to prevent deceit and fraud upon the public and upon the business first in the field. Spieker v. Lash, 102 Cal. 38, 36 Pac. 362; Waltham Watch Co. v. United States Watch Co., 173 Mass. 85, 73 Am. St. Rep. 265, 43 L. R. A. 826, 53 N. E. 141; Shaver v. Shaver, 54 Iowa, 208, 37 Am. Rep. 194, 6 N. W. 188; Newman v. Alvord, 51 N. Y. 189, 10 Am. Rep. 588. But, as has been intimated, relief in such cases really rests upon the deceit or fraud which the later comer into the business field is practicing upon the earlier comer and upon the public."

The case of Eastern Outfitting Co. v. Manheim, 59 Wash. 428, 110 Pac. 23, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 251, may also be cited as illustrating the application of the foregoing principle to a state of facts somewhat resembling those of the case at bar. In that case the plaintiff, the Eastern Outfitting Company, a California corporation, had for some years been engaged in business in the city of Seattle, Wash., under its corporate and trade-name. The defendant, Manheim, had established and was conducting a similar business in the city of Spokane, Wash., under the name of "Eastern Outfitting Company." The plaintiff undertook to secure an injunction preventing the defendant from the use in Spokane of said trade-name. The Supreme Court of Washington, in denying such application, held that the plaintiff, not having been engaged in the actual business of selling its goods in Spokane, and having no customers there, could not enjoin the defendant from the use in the latter place of the same trade-name, since in order to the application of the doctrine of unfair competition there must have been competition at said point through which the plaintiff had suffered by an unfair use on the part of the defendant of its trade-name. In the case of Sartor v. Schaden, 125 Iowa, 696, 101 N. W. 511, the court gave application to the principle in the terse statement that "there cannot be unfair competition unless there is competition," while in the case of Maxwell v. Hogg, L. R. 2 Ch. 307, it was said:

> "The mere declaration of an intention, however public, to publish a magazine or any manufactured articles, bearing a particular name or mark, notwithstanding such declaration is accompanied by expenditure in connection with the intended article, cannot create a right to the exclusive use of a name or mark as a trade mark."

See, also, 38 Cyc. 670:

[3] Applying the principle as set forth and illustrated in the foregoing cases to the facts of the case at bar, it would seem clear that the plaintiff had acquired no right to the exclusive use of the trade-name "Yellow Taxicab Company of San Diego" in connection with any business actually carried on under said name in the city of San Diego prior to the defendants' appropriation and use of said trade-name in the business which they had established and were conducting therein at the time of the institution of this action. The same doctrine must be given application to the defendants' appropriation and use of the trade phrase or slogan "It takes the tax out of taxi," since no distinction in fact or principle can be found between a trade-name and a trade slogan. Whatever rights the Chicago corporation may have gained to the use of the trade slogan, "It took the tax out of taxi," in places where it was actually engaged in disposing of its distinctive product, as against those who might attempt to deceive the public by making and selling taxicabs identical or similar in color and form with its distinctive type, and by using said trade-name or trade slogan in that sort of unfair competition, it is clear that it had no rights which it could assert or transfer to this plaintiff as against these defendants, who were not engaged in the manufacture or sale of a like article in San Diego or elsewhere, and, hence, were not in competition with the Chicago concern. The plaintiff herein was in no sense a successor or a licensee of the Chicago corporation in the use of either said name or slogan, and could acquire no right to the exclusive utilization of either except through priority of use.

The judgment is affirmed.

GOATMAN et al. v. FULLER et al.

1. Judgment 🔑321—Amendment of judgment for error outside of record must be ordered within reasonable time.

In a suit to have plaintiffs declared owners of a certain lease of real property and to compel transfer of the lease, plaintiffs' attorney copied a purported copy of the lease into his complaint and discovered after affirmance of an interlocutory decree for plaintiffs that "NE ¼" had been erroneously substituted for "NW ¼." A motion to amend complaint, findings, and decree was made 21 months after trial. Held, that this was too late; that, the error not appearing on the record, section 473, Code Civ. Proc., applied, limiting the court's jurisdiction to allow such relief to 6 months at most after trial.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1170(12)—Reversal not defeating enforcement of judgment denied.

Where the court 21 months after trial granted plaintiff's motion to amend the complaint, findings, and judgment, all based upon an erroneous description of the land in the complaint, notwithstanding section 473, Code Civ. Proc., the judgment being enforceable in any event, the order will not be disturbed in view of section 475.

3. Judgment 🔑18(3)—Error in complaint held immaterial.

In an action to compel surrender of a lease where the allegations of the complaint were sufficient to identify the lease intended, an error in the specific description of the land is immaterial to the enforcement of the judgment based on such complaint.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1167—Reversal of order denied where equity would grant relief sought.

Where the only effect of an order reversing an erroneous order would be to force plaintiff to seek the same relief in equity, where it would clearly be granted, reversal will be denied.

Myers, J., and Wilbur, C. J., dissenting in part.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Suit by William Goatman and another against O. B. Fuller and others. From an order amending the complaint, findings, and judgment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

U. T. Clotfelter and E. T. Lucey, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Anderson & Anderson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This action was originally brought by the plaintiffs to have themselves declared to be the owners of a certain lease of real property; to compel the defendants to transfer the lease to them and to account to them for all the rents, issues, and profits of the leased premises. Pursuant to findings of fact and conclusions of law made and filed by the court, an interlocutory decree was entered in favor of the plaintiffs on July 7, 1919, which decree was subsequently affirmed on appeal. 50 Cal. App. 403, 195 Pac. 256. No question of the merits of the case is involved in this proceeding.

In their complaint plaintiffs incorporated what purported to be a copy of the lease, containing the following description of the land:

> "The NE¼ of section 30, containing 160 acres, the NE¼ of section 29, containing 160 acres, in township 4 south, range 11 west, S. B. B. and M., less that portion included in the county roads."

This description was adopted in the findings of fact by reference to the paragraph of the complaint in which it appeared. It was set out verbatim in the interlocutory decree. On April 25, 1921, after the affirmance of the decree on appeal and 21 months after its rendition, the plaintiffs moved the court to amend the complaint, findings, and decree by nunc pro tunc order, so that whenever in them occurred the words "the NE¼ of section 29, containing 160 acres," they be changed and amended to read "the NW¼ of section 29, containing 106 acres."

An affidavit by counsel for the plaintiffs was filed in support of the motion, setting forth that when the complaint was drafted by him he was supplied by the plaintiffs with what purported to be a correct copy of the lease, which copy was set forth in the complaint; that the copy was not a true copy of the original, in that it contained the error in description now sought to be corrected; that the error persisted in all subsequent papers in the case and became a part of the findings and judgment; that his attention was first called to the scrivener's mistake by counsel for the defendants after the affirmance of the interlocutory decree on appeal; that the case was tried by all the parties upon the assumption and belief that the property actually involved was that described by the lease; that the defendants were at all times in possession of one of the originals of the lease, had full knowledge of the true description of the property, and could not have been misled by the partial misdescription. An affidavit in opposition to the motion was filed by the defendants' attorney, in which he set up that the proceeding was barred by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that the ends of justice would not be served by the amendment, in that the defendants would be compelled to surrender possession of 160 acres of land not described in the complaint and would be punished for a fault of the plaintiffs; that it is immaterial whether or not the defendants were misled, for they had the right to stand on the case made out by the complaint; and that the situation in which the plaintiffs now find themselves is wholly due to their inexcusable neglect and mistake, as they were in possession of an original duplicate of the lease at the time of the trial and inserted a full copy of it in the transcript on appeal. The court granted plaintiffs' motion and ordered the complaint, findings, and decree amended as prayed. From that order defendants take this appeal, insisting this is not a case in which the court has inherent power to amend its judgment, and that, as more than six months had elapsed since its rendition, no such power is granted by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides:

> "The court may * * * upon such terms as may be just, relieve a party or his legal representative from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect; provided, that application therefor be made within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after such judgment, order or proceeding was taken."

Respondents' position is that the decision of the court upon which the decree was given was for an assignment by appellants of the lease actually executed, and for possession by respondents of the property described in the lease, not of that misdescribed in the copy contained in the complaint; that the error of misdescription entered into the judgment itself; and that the judgment therefore did not speak verity as to what was in fact decided by the court. They further insisted that the issue in the suit was the ownership of the lease in question; that the effect of the decree was that the lease belonged to them and should be turned over to them; that the land covered by the lease should be put in their possession; and that the correction was merely of a clerical error and in no sense altered the substance of the judgment.

In Scamman v. Bonslett, 118 Cal. 93, 50 Pac. 272, 62 Am. St. Rep. 226, the plaintiff sued to foreclose a mortgage. No deficiency judgment was asked and none was originally granted. About 17 months after the judgment was rendered, it was amended to include a deficiency judgment against one of the defendants. The amendment was held to be void. With respect to the right of a court to amend its judgment, it was said:

> "A court may at any time render or amend a judgment where the record discloses that the entry on the minutes does not correctly give what was the judgment of the court. Morrison v. Dapman, 3 Cal. 255.
> "Any error or defect in a record occurring through acts of omission or commission of the clerk in entering or failing to properly enter of record the judgment or proceedings of the court—in short, what may be termed clerical misprisions—may, the record affording the evidence thereof, be corrected at any time by the court upon its own motion, or on motion of an interested party either with or without notice. Where, however, an inspection of the record does not show the error, and resort must be had to evidence aliunde, courts will require notice to be given of a motion to amend a judgment to the parties to be affected thereby, and a motion for the amendment of a judgment in such last-mentioned case must, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, be made within six months, except in cases where personal service of summons has not been had, in which cases the court may grant relief within one year after the entry of judgment. [Citing cases.]
> "Again, amendments to judgments can only be allowed for the purpose of making the record conform to the truth, not for the purpose of revising and changing the judgment. (Black on Judgments, § 156.) The same author adds:
> " 'If, on the other hand, the proposed addition is a mere afterthought, and formed no part of the judgment as originally intended and pronounced, it cannot be brought in by way of amendment.' "

This case was cited with approval in Herd v. Tuohy, 133 Cal. 55, 61, 65 Pac. 139, and in City and County of San Francisco v. Brown, 153 Cal. 644, 651, 96 Pac. 281, and the rules therein declared were also followed in Dreyfuss v. Tompkins, 67 Cal. 339, 7 Pac. 732; Fallon v. Brittan, 84 Cal. 511, 24 Pac. 381; Bemmerly v. Woodward, 124 Cal. 568, 57 Pac. 561; Fay v. Stubenrauch, 141 Cal. 573, 75 Pac. 174; Takekawa v. Hole, 170 Cal. 323, 149 Pac. 593; Mader v. Christie, 52 Cal. App. 138, 198 Pac. 45; and numerous other cases to which we need not refer.

In Estate of Potter, 141 Cal. 424, 75 Pac. 850, the trial court had amended a judgment previously rendered by allowing costs. The modification was ordered stricken from the judgment, this court declaring that—

> "The object of entering judgments and decrees as of some previous date is to supply matters of evidence and to rectify clerical misprisions, but not to enable the court to correct judicial errors. If the court has not rendered a judgment that it might or should have rendered, or if it has rendered an imperfect or improper judgment, it has no power to remedy such errors by ordering an amendment nunc pro tunc of a proper judgment. [Citing authorities.]"

It was held in First National Bank of Fresno v. Dusy, 110 Cal. 69, 42 Pac. 476, that an improper amendment of a judgment was "unauthorized and beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and therefore void," and in Byrne v. Hoag, 116 Cal. 1, 47 Pac. 775, that the court was without jurisdiction to make such an amendment.

In the case at bar the error is in no way disclosed by the record. The complaint stated a cause of action to secure the assignment of a lease and to recover possession of the land covered thereby. The description of the land is set out in the judgment roll but twice; once in the complaint and once in the judgment. In other places the land is simply referred to as that described in the complaint. Nowhere is it described by metes and bounds or in any other manner by reference to which the error in the description sought to be corrected might be made to appear. See Fallon v. Brittan, supra; Bemmerly v. Woodward, supra; Halpern v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 212 Pac. 916. The misdescription was neither a judicial error nor clerical misprision. It was a mistake on the part of the plaintiffs.

[1] The findings were based upon the facts as stated in the complaint and the judgment granted the relief prayed for. In the last recital of the judgment, the court declared the lease covered the land described, and gave the description contained in the complaint. As far as appears from the record, the court decided the issues as they were presented to it and rendered its judgment accordingly. There is no clerical misprision and no difference between the decision of the court as rendered and the record of that decision as embodied in the judgment. The only evidence tending to show there is any irregularity in the record appears aliunde in the affidavits of the respective parties. Under the authorities cited above, the court had no power in such a situation to amend the judgment upon its own motion or upon motion of a party, for more than six months had elapsed after the judgment was entered before steps were taken to amend it.

[2, 3] However, we have reached the conclusion that the rights of the appellants could not have been prejudicially affected by the amendment and that it is unnecessary, under section 475 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to reverse the order.

This action was originally brought, not to recover the real property described nor to quiet title thereto, but to compel appellants to assign a certain lease, and in our view sufficient facts appear from the record to entitle respondents to enforce their rights. The lease itself is fully identified in the complaint, answer, findings, and judgment. It is described as one dated September 24, 1917, executed by the Artesian Land Company to O. B. Fuller.

It was alleged in the complaint that the lease was one made in favor of Fuller solely as security for money due to him from one Peter Karales; that Fuller took and held the lease in trust for that purpose for Karales, his successors and assigns; that on December 4, 1918, the obligations of Karales to appellants were discharged and that Karales assigned to respondents all his interest in the lease and the leased premises; that respondents demanded the lease of appellants, which appellants refused to deliver; and that appellants still hold the lease and possession of the premises described therein. Respondents prayed that they be adjudged the owners of the lease and entitled to the rents and profits of the demised premises and to any and all subleases appellants might have executed; that appellants be directed to account to them for such rents and profits and to produce and assign all subleases to respondents; and that appellants be required to set out any claims they might have in the premises adverse to respondents.

Appellants alleged in their answer that the Artesian Land Company executed and delivered the lease mentioned in the complaint, but that O. B. Fuller did not take it as trustee for Karales. They admitted by not denying that they had possession of the leased premises and denied their obligation to turn over the lease. The court, in its findings of fact, conclusions of law, and judgment, followed generally the terms of the complaint. The relief prayed for was granted, and at the end of the judgment the statement was inserted that the lease covered the land erroneously described.

In view of these facts there can be no uncertainty in the minds of any of the parties as to the identity of the lease in question. The decree did not purport to quiet title to the land nor to remove a cloud from respondents' title. The subject-matter of the suit was the lease itself, which was sufficiently identified without reference to the description of the land. The description may, therefore, be regarded as surplusage. Under these circumstances, appellants are entirely unwarranted in refusing to deliver up the lease described, and respondents are entitled to the assistance of the court in compelling them to do so.

A further question is presented in this connection by the fact that in addition to ordering the surrender of the lease, the court ordered appellants to surrender possession of the land covered thereby. For the respondents to be able to enforce their rights the judgment must, of course, be definite enough to enable the sheriff to put respondents in possession of the land. But it is not necessary to accomplish this that the land be described in the judgment. It was held in Kelly v. McKibben, 54 Cal. 192, that—

> "The mode of describing the property recovered in the judgment is not one that we can conscientiously recommend as a precedent. But the description is not uncertain. Certum est quod certum reddi potest. The reference in the judgment to the finding, and in the finding to the complaint, for a description of the property, is inexcusably circuitous, but not ambiguous."

The judgment in the case before us was therefore sufficient without the description, for by reference to the lease, which was ordered delivered up, the description could be ascertained. The amendment only served to make more certain that which already appeared by reference. No other effect could have been given to the judgment as amended than to it as it originally stood. It makes no difference to either party, therefore, whether or not the court assumed jurisdiction when it had none and corrected tne error. What it did was a nullity which cannot affect the enforcement of the judgment, and in such a situation the question in reality becomes moot.

We are aware of no authority holding that the action of a trial court might be upheld notwithstanding that it acted without jurisdiction. However, In re McGrew, 183 Cal. 177, 181, 190 Pac. 804, 806, wherein the trial court vacated an order of adoption more than six months after it was rendered, upon appeal from the second order, it was said:

> "She [appellant] contends that the six months allowed by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure within which to apply for relief by motion or petition in the case itself had fully expired before the petition was filed, and that the only other mode by which relief on the ground of fraud or mistake can be obtained is by an action in the nature of a bill in equity. If the point were good, a proposition which it is not necessary here to determine, it would not be sufficient as ground for reversal, since it would be an error in procedure and pleading only. (Const. art. VI, § 4½.)"

This statement, athough not necessary to the decision of the case, would indicate that the provision does not affect the court's jurisdiction, but is simply a matter of procedure, an error or defect in which, if not prejudicial, would not warrant a reversal.

[4] Moreover, there is no contention in this case but that the description of the land originally contained in the judgment is erroneous. Therefore the only effect of a reversal of the order would be to remit respondents to an action in equity, in which they unquestionably would be entitled to have the judgment amended. Young v. Fink, 119 Cal. 107, 50 Pac. 1060; In re McGrew, supra. To obviate any such further proceedings, let the order be affirmed.

MYERS, J. I concur with the judgment, but I dissent from that portion of the main opinion which holds that the court had no power to amend its judgment under the circumstances here obtaining after six months had elapsed. I think that a court of record always retains the jurisdiction and power to correct its own records so as to make them speak the truth in those cases wherein the error corrected consists merely of a clerical error or misprision, provided there are no intervening rights of innocent third parties to be affected thereby. I think that this rule applies equally whether the clerical error was one made by the clerk or by the judge, but I agree that it does not apply to amendments made for the purpose of revising or changing the judgment, or of adding something thereto which formed no part of the judgment as originally intended and pronounced. This was a case of clerical error made by the judge in embodying in the decision of the court a misdescription of the premises. He was induced thereto by the original error of the scrivener in making a copy of the lease, but it was nothing more than a clerical misprision which resulted in the fact that the decision signed and filed by the judge did not truly set forth the decision actually rendered by him. Under these circumstances, I think the trial court acted within its jurisdiction and power in making the correction complained of.

I concur: WILBUR, C. J.

PEOPLE v. YOSEMITE LUMBER CO.

(Sac. 3378.)

1. Master and servant 🔑347—Workmen's Re-education Act held invalid.

St. 1919, p. 274, §§ 5, 6, in so far as they attempt to invest the Industrial Commission with jurisdiction to create or enforce a liability on the part of employers to compensate the workmen of other employers, or dependents of such workmen, or to require the employers of workmen killed during the course of their employment, but leaving no dependents, to pay into the state treasury a sum named, for the rehabilitation and re-education of persons injured in the service of other employers, is invalid under Const. art. 20, § 21, as amended in 1918.

2. Taxation 🔑40(2)—Workmen's Re-education Act held a tax measure, subject to principles governing taxation, particularly uniformity within a proper classification.

St. 1919, p. 273, requiring employers to pay the sum of $350 into the state treasury for each fatal compensable injury suffered by any of their employees who do not leave surviving dependents, held a tax measure, which, in order to be valid, must be found to conform to the essential purposes governing taxation, particularly uniformity, upon all those who come within a proper classification subject to the burden of the particular tax.

3. Master and servant 🔑347—Taxation 🔑42(1)—Workmen's Re-education Act held tax measure invalid for lack of uniform classification.

St. 1919, p. 273, requiring employers to pay the sum of $350 to the state treasury for each fatal compensable injury suffered by an employee who did not leave surviving dependents, and providing for the use of such money for the rehabilitation and re-education of persons injured in the service of other employers, held a tax measure, and invalid because not based on any reasonable classification, nor can it be sustained as a regulatory measure not for the purpose of revenue, nor did the fact that there existed a state compensation insurance fund to which employers might resort for protection operate to relieve the law of its defect in lack of uniformity.

4. Statutes 🔑64(2)—Workmen's Re-education Act held invalid as whole, on adjudication that certain sections were invalid.

St. 1919, p. 273, because of its close connection with the Workmen's Compensation Act, and its adoption of definitions contained in that act, and its supplementary connection, held intended by its framers to stand or fall as a whole, so that the whole must be deemed invalid on adjudication of invalidity of sections 5 and 6.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California, by the State Controller and the Industrial Accident Commission, against the Yosemite Lumber Company, a corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and A. E. Graupner and Warren H. Pillsbury, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Arthur W. Bolton, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in the defendant's favor, in an action instituted in the name of the people of the state of California by the state controller and the Industrial Accident Commission, to recover from the defendant the sum of $350 upon an alleged liability created under the provisions of chapter 183 of the Statutes of 1919. Stats. 1919, p. 273. The identical facts which form the basis of this action were presented before this court in the case of Yosemite Lumber Co. et al. v. Industrial Accident Commission et al., 187 Cal. 774, 204 Pac. 226, 20 A. L. R. 994, with the exception that in that proceeding the Manufacturer's Indemnity Exchange, the insurance carrier of the Yosemite Lumber Company, was joined as a party with the latter, but omitted here, while in this action the state controller is united with the Industrial Accident Commission as one of the parties instituting the same. This difference in parties in interest does not, however, affect the identity of the main questions discussed in that proceeding and presented upon this appeal. The former proceeding arose out of an application for a writ of review, wherein this court was asked to review and annul an order of the Industrial Accident Commission requiring the Yosemite Lumber Company to pay to the state of California the sum of $350 for the death of one John Moore, one of the employees of said corporation, who died from an injury received while in its employ and arising out of and in the course of said employment; the said John Moore leaving no dependents surviving him. The said order for said award was made under the provisions and by the authority of the act of 1919 above referred to. At the outset of its consideration of the questions involved in that case, this court stated that the sole question for decision was as to whether the said act gave to the Commission jurisdiction to adjudicate the liability of the employer to the state. In deciding that question this court held that, under the amendment of section 21 of article 20 of the state Constitution, adopted in 1918, investing the Legislature with power to create a system for the enforcement of workmen's compensation through and by means of an Industrial Accident Commission, the powers of the Legislature in that regard were limited thereby to the investment of the said Commission, with jurisdiction to create and enforce a liability on the part of employers to compensate their workmen and surviving dependents for injuries sustained or death incurred by such workmen in the course of their employment, and that such constitutional grant of power to the Legislature did not authorize it to invest said Commission with jurisdiction to create or enforce a liability on the part of employers to compensate the workmen of other employers, or dependents of such workmen, or to require the employers of workmen killed during the course of their employment, but leaving no surviving dependents, to pay into the state treasury the sum provided in said act of 1919 for the rehabilitation and re-education of persons injured in the service of other employers than those upon whom the liability to make said payment was by said act imposed; and that said act, in so far as it attempted, in sections 5 and 6 thereof, to invest such Commission with such jurisdiction was unconstitutional and void.

After the decision of this court in that proceeding, and to that effect, became final, the present action was commenced by the state of California at the instance of the state controller and the Industrial Accident Commission, in the superior court of the county of Sacramento, for the purpose of collecting directly from the Yosemite Lumber Company the sum of $350 alleged to be due and payable to the state under the provisions of the act of 1919, not directly held to be void by the decision of this court in said former proceeding, but arising out of the identical facts considered therein with relation to the injury and death of John Moore while an employee of said corporation, leaving no surviving dependents. It was and is the contention of the plaintiff, in instituting and maintaining this action and in taking and prosecuting this appeal that the decision of this court in said former proceeding declaring sections 5 and 6 of said act of 1919 to be unconstitutional and void, did not have the effect of rendering nugatory the remaining sections of said act, and that, under the provisions thereof not affected by said decision, a liability was created for the payment by said corporation to the state of California of the sum of $350, by reason of the injury to and death of said John Moore while an employee of said corporation and in the course of his employment, leaving no surviving dependents; and that said liability was susceptible of being enforced by the state of California in this form of action.

To the complaint seeking this recovery the defendant corporation presented a demurrer upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of said action, and also upon the general ground that the said complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The defendant also presented an answer in several counts, in all of which the averments of fact in said complaint were admitted, but in which all liability on the part of the defendant arising out of said facts was expressly denied. The defendant also, in certain of said counts in its said answer, set forth with more of detail the facts as to the employment, injury, and death of said employee and as to his having left no surviving dependents entitled to compensation or to the benefits under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831). Several grounds of alleged unconstitutionality of said act were specified in the defendant's said answer. The trial court sustained the defendant's demurrer and granted its motion for judgment on the pleadings; and, upon the plaintiff's refusal to amend, judgment was entered in the defendant's favor. It is from such judgment that this appeal has been taken.

[1] One of the first but not most strenuously urged contentions of the plaintiff upon this appeal is that the decision of this court in the matter of Yosemite Lumber Company et al. v. Industrial Accident Commission et al., supra, holding sections 5 and 6 of the act of 1919 to be unconstitutional and void, was founded in error and should be overruled. It may be suggested, incidentally, that one of the results of sustaining this contention would be to render good the defendant's ground of demurrer to the effect that the superior court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of this action, since, by the provisions of the Constitution and statutes dealing with compensable injuries to workmen, the courts, except through the limited processes of writs of review, have been deprived of jurisdiction of such matters, while the particular statute under review herein in those sections thereof, which the appellant now insists we have erroneously held to be void, invests, not the courts, but the Industrial Accident Commission, with full jurisdiction over the very matter of which the plaintiff and appellant in this action is seeking to have the superior court and this court assume jurisdiction. But, however this may be, this court remains satisfied with the reasoning and conclusions of its decision in said former proceeding as to the invalidity of said sections 5 and 6 of said act of 1919, and hereby expressly approves and reaffirms the same.

The next and main contention of the appellant herein is that, notwithstanding the former decision of this court holding sections 5 and 6 of said act of 1919 to be unconstitutional and void, the main body of said act was not affected by said ruling, but remained in full force and effect, and, so remaining, was susceptible of enforcement through the medium of the courts and in this form of action. This contention on the part of the appellant is founded in the assertion and argument that the state of California has power independently of its express constitutional and statutory provisions relating to compensable injuries or fatalities to workmen, but under its general police powers, to provide for the rehabilitation and re-education of persons disabled in industry, by creating a fund for such purposes; and that, possessing such power, it has also the power to impose the burden of providing and maintaining such fund upon employers as a class. In making this contention, the appellant, among other authorities, relies upon the following language used by this court in the case of Yosemite Lumber Co. et al. v. Industrial Accident Commission et al., supra, wherein this court says:

> "It may be conceded that under its general powers the Legislature might provide a fund for the benefit of persons disabled in industry in this state and commit the administration of the fund to the Industrial Accident Commission and might also levy a tax in some form to raise such fund."

The respondent herein, however, strenuously contends that this concession may not properly or safely be made, and the argument which it puts forth to sustain its contention in this regard is this: That the general or police powers of a state are only those powers which can be exercised under and in harmony with its Constitution, and that when the state Constitution has spoken with respect to how far its Legislature may go in the enactment of laws upon a particular subject the Legislature may not go beyond the limits thus prescribed by the Constitution under the guise of exercising general or police powers in relation to that subject. The state Constitution has spoken upon the subject of workmen's compensation and upon the extent of the liability and burden to be laid upon employers as a class for the payment of awards for injuries received by their workmen while in their employ, and that the limitations upon legislative power in that regard are to be found in section 21 of article 20 of the Constitution, which declares the policy and defines the powers of the state acting through its Legislature upon that subject, and in so doing has delegated to the Legislature the power, and the power only, "to create and enforce a liability on the part of any or all persons to compensate any or all of their workmen for injury or disability and * * * for [their] death incurred or sustained by the said workmen in the course of their employment." It is the respondent's contention that the language of the Constitution above quoted, upon the principle of expressio unius est exclusio alterius, places a limitation upon the power of the Legislature to impose any further liability upon employers for injuries to their employees arising in the course of industry than that expressed in said section of the Constitution, and hence that the Legislature had no power to go beyond that limitation with respect to employers' liability under the guise of the exercise of general or police power. The respondent cites in support of this contention the language of this court used in said former proceeding, wherein this court, in construing the above-quoted provision of the Constitution, said:

> "The next phrase of the new act empowers the Legislature 'in that behalf to create and enforce a liability on the part of any and all persons to compensate any and all of their workmen for injury or disability, and their dependents for death incurred or sustained by the said workmen in the course of their employment.' This does not authorize the creation of a liability on the part of any person to compensate the workmen of other persons, nor the dependents of workmen of other persons. The phrase 'their workmen' necessarily confines the persons to be compensated to workmen who are in the employ of the person who is made liable. This is also shown by the provision that if the workman is killed by an injury in the course of his employment, the compensation is to be made to his 'dependents,' thus excluding any idea of liability in such a case to provide for the welfare of workmen in general, or of a particular class of disabled workmen, in no way connected with the employer who is made liable for the particular injury. * * * The use in this clause of the words 'any and all persons,' in describing those made liable, and the words 'any and all of their workmen,' in describing those to be compensated, do not show an intent to empower the Legislature to enlarge the liability against a particular employer for a particular injury so as to include compensation to workmen in general as a class or a contribution to a fund to be applied to the benefit of a class of persons, instead of to the dependents of the workman who may be killed by the injury. Nor is such enlarged meaning given to the section by the use of the phrase 'complete system of workmen's compensation,' in the opening clause or by the elaborate definition of that phrase which follows the first sentence. The section mentions and describes but one kind of liability: The liability of 'any or all persons' to compensate 'any or all of their workmen.' * * * The language of neither one of these parts of the section shows or expresses an intent to add another liability to that expressly stated. In these circumstances the maxim 'expressio unius, est exclusio alterius,' is applicable, and the meaning to be inferred is that only which is explicitly stated. And particularly it should not be inferred or implied from such language that so novel and different a thing was intended as the liability to the state which is imposed by the Act of 1919."

The argument which the respondent predicates upon the foregoing language of this court in said former proceeding is plausible and has much persuasive force, and if given full effect would not only render the act of 1919 wholly void, but would set a constitutional limitation upon the power of the Legislature to enact any law providing a fund for the benefit of persons disabled in industry which would place the burden of its maintenance upon employers, except in so far as that liability related to their own individual employees. We do not deem it incumbent upon us by the exigencies of this case to go thus far, since we think the statute of 1919 must be held void for infirmities which will hereinafter be made to appear. Passing, therefore, this question and coming to the consideration of those provisions of the act of 1919 upon which, regardless of our former ruling, the appellant relies for its right to maintain this action, we are first led to consider the nature of the burden which said act imposes upon those who are by its terms required to pay into the state treasury the sum of money demanded of this defendant.

[2] By the terms of section 1 of said act, employers are required to pay into the treasury of the state of California the sum of $350 for each fatal compensable injury suffered by any of their employees who do not leave surviving dependents entitled to death benefits under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Said moneys, when so paid into the state treasury, are to be placed in a special fund to be known as "the industrial rehabilitation fund," and are to be used for the purposes set forth in section 2 of said act, which provides that said fund may be drawn upon by the Industrial Accident Commission for the promotion of vocational reeducation and rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry in this state. It will thus be seen that the source of the fund to be thus accumulated in the state treasury is that of a compulsory payment of a definite sum by a certain class of persons known as employers; and that the destination of said fund is that of benefits conferred upon a certain other class of persons in this state who have been disabled in industry. That the liability thus imposed by the state upon employers is a charge upon persons or property cannot be controverted; and that the purpose to which the public fund, when thus accumulated, is to be devoted is a public purpose, would seem equally impossible of denial. The imposition is therefore a tax, and the statute which imposes it and provides for its collection and distribution is a tax measure within the accepted definition of that term. It was, in fact, so expressly held to be by this court in the former proceeding wherein the following language was used:

> "In so far as the act purports to exact from employers a sum to be used by the state for disabled workmen in general, it is in reality a taxing law, a revenue measure. It requires any employer to pay to the state the sum of $350 whenever one of his workmen who has no dependents is killed by an injury received in the course of his employment, and the fund thus raised is to be used for vocational re-education of workmen not connected in any way with such employer, and the surplus, if any, to go to pay the expenses of the state in carrying on the department or bureau administered by the Industrial Accident Commission, all of which are public purposes. This is purely a tax. 'A tax is a charge upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes.' (Perry v. Washburn, 20 Cal. 350.) A tax 'includes every charge upon persons or property, imposed by or under the authority of the Legislature, for public purposes.' (Madera v. Black, 181 Cal. 310, 184 Pac. 400; 1 Cooley on Taxation, p. 6.)"

[3] The act of 1919 having been thus determined to be a tax measure it must, in order to be valid, be found to conform to the essential purposes governing taxation. Chief among these essential purposes is that of uniformity. A tax measure imposing a tax for revenue must, in order to be valid, lay its burdens uniformly upon all those who come within a proper classification of the persons to be subjected to the burden of the particular tax. 1 Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) p. 4; Kansas City v. Whipple, 136 Mo. 295, 38 S. W. 295, 35 L. R. A. 747, 58 Am. St. Rep. 657. The class of persons to be subjected to the tax in question are employers. The law, considered as a revenue measure, must, in order to be valid, bear uniformly, either upon all employers in this state, or upon some portion of them who may be found to come reasonably within a narrower classification. The act of 1919, considered as such a tax measure, attempts to make such narrower classification by confining the application of its burden, to those employers only whose workmen killed in the course of employment leave no surviving dependents. Such a classification, in order to be valid, must have some reasonable basis for this differentiation. The only basis which is or can be urged in its support consists in the occasional and purely accidental circumstance that such employers happen to have such workmen having no dependents, killed in the course of their employment. It should require neither argument nor authority to show that such a purely adventitious condition could form no reasonable basis for the classification attempted by this act, particularly in view of the other provisions thereof, by the terms of which the proceeds of this tax are to be devoted to the benefit, not of the employers required to pay the tax, nor even of their employees, but to the benefit and betterment of a class of persons bearing no relation to either, but who have been injured in other employments in the general course of industry. The appellant contends that the act in question, though conceded to be a tax measure, is to be regarded as levying such tax for regulation and not for revenue, and hence not to come within the rule requiring uniformity. This contention is sought to be supported by the argument that one of the purposes of the act is that of preventing selfish employers from employing workmen having noncompensable dependents, in order to avoid the much larger awards of death benefits to deceased workmen leaving dependents, which are allowable under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The difference in amount between the particular charge imposed by the act in question and the very much larger awards to those workmen who leave surviving dependents, allowable under the Workmen's Compensation Act, should suffice of itself to reduce this argument to a degree of refinement which leaves it with no persuasive force; but in addition to that it may be noted, as a fact of universal acceptance, that workmen who have wives and families "have given hostages to fortune" and are as a rule more careful, more dependable, and less liable to avoidable injuries than are those who have no such social or domestic ties. This reason, therefore, utterly fails for dealing with this imposition as a regulatory tax. The appellant further contends that the requirements of uniformity in the exactions of this act, considered as a revenue measure, are met and satisfied by the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act, which provides for a state compensation insurance fund to which employers, by the payment of a relatively small sum, may have resort for protection against the liabilities imposed by these acts. We are unable to perceive how this permitted recourse for the employer, while it might lessen the amount of his burden, could be effectual to relieve the law of its defect of lack of uniformity, treated as a revenue tax measure. The case of Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 151 Pac. 398, from the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Shaw, of which the appellant quotes certain passages, was not dealing with the question of taxation, but solely with the power of the Legislature in enacting a workmen's compensation law to create discriminations based upon certain well-defined classifications of employments. Neither do we regard the case of State v. Clausen, 65 Wash. 156, 117 Pac. 1101, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 466, 94 N. J. Law, 357, as having any bearing upon the immediate subject under discussion, since in that case the charge imposed upon employers in extra-hazardous occupations was based upon a well-defined distinction and classification and was supported for that reason. We are unable to perceive any material distinction, either in fact or in principle, between the case at bar and the case of Bryant v. Lindsay, 110 Atl. 823, where the Supreme Court of New Jersey, in dealing with the statute of that state almost identical with the act of 1919, after holding the imposition of the New Jersey statute to be a tax imposed for the purpose of supporting the expense of a state agency, goes on to say:

> "Such a tax has manifestly no relation to the police power; it is plainly not a property tax, and when we consider that it is restricted not merely to employers generally who have in their employ workmen with no dependents entitled to claim, but employers of that character who are within section 2 of the Compensation Act we reach a tenuity of classification that seems to us to deprive the class of any logical validity and of all substantial basis. Southern Railway Co. v. Green, 216 U. S. 400, 30 Sup. Ct. 287, 54 L. Ed. 536, 17 Ann. Cas. 1247."

[4] The respondent herein urges yet other constitutional grounds against the validity of the act of 1919, treated as a tax measure, which we do not deem it necessary to consider. There is, however, a final reason which impels us to the conclusion that this act, considered as a whole, has been rendered invalid by the decision of this court in the former proceeding which eliminated from its provisions sections 5 and 6 thereof. The act, regarded as a whole, was obviously intended by the lawmakers to be supplementary to the general Workmen's Compensation Act of this state. It refers in its title to said act. It adopts the definitions of said act as to compensable injuries, as to those entitled to death benefits and as to the basis of calculation of the total awards in such cases. It places the administration of the fund to be derived from its enforcement in the hands of the Industrial Accident Commission, and it vests in said Commission complete judicial power over the matter of the making and collection of the award from which it provides, and with full jurisdiction and authority to hear and determine all questions and controversies arising under the act, in accordance with the procedure provided for the exercise of such jurisdiction by that body in the Workmen's Compensation Act. Beyond this it is barren of any suggestion that the courts should have any jurisdiction whatever over the enforcement of its provisions. This being so, we are impelled to the conclusion that the act was intended by its framers to stand or fall as a whole, and, hence, that the elimination of sections 5 and 6 therefrom by our former decision so far interfered with the purposes and operation of the act as to render it void as a whole.

Judgment affirmed.

OLIVIERI v. POLICE COURT OF CITY OF BAKERSFIELD et al. (Civ. 4162.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 4, 1923.)

1. Intoxicating liquors 🔑11—City ordinance providing heavier penalty than state law for same act is void.

A city ordinance making it unlawful for any person to keep or store intoxicating liquor in any public or semipublic place, and fixing as a penalty for its violation a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment not more than 180 days, imposes a heavier penalty than is imposed for the same offense by Wright Act, § 2, which enacts as the law of the state a provision of Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 3, prohibiting unlawful possession but imposing no imprisonment for the first offense, and therefore the ordinance is void under Const. art. 11, § 11, delegating to cities power to enact such regulations that are not in conflict with the general law.

2. Criminal law 🔑252(3)—Complaint held to charge offense under statute notwithstanding reference to ordinance.

A complaint in a police court charging that defendant had kept and stored intoxicating liquor in the city without having a valid permit so to do, contrary to the provisions of a city ordinance and contrary to the statutes of the state, sufficiently charges a violation of Wright Act, § 2, to sustain it under that statute, even though the city ordinance referred to was void.

3. Criminal law 🔑94—Complaint held not to charge maintenance of nuisance, but possession within jurisdiction of police court.

A complaint charging that defendant unlawfully kept and stored intoxicating liquor in a building within designated city did not charge a violation of Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21, imposing as penalty for maintaining a nuisance a fine and imprisonment which were beyond the police court of the city, but only charged the offense of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, a prosecution for which was within the jurisdiction of that court.

Application for writ of prohibition by A. Olivieri, prayed to be directed to the Police Court of City of Bakersfield and C. F. Baughman, Judge thereof, to prevent the Judge from proceeding with the trial of petitioner on the charge of unlawfully possessing intoxicating liquor. Demurrer to petition sustained, and petition denied.

Dorsey & Campbell and Irwin & Laird, all of Bakersfield, for petitioner.

E. F. Brittan and M. G. Brittan, both of Bakersfield, and Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

W. D. McConnell and J. Friedlander, both of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

CURTIS, J. A complaint was filed in the police court of the city of Bakersfield charging that the defendant on the 24th day of December, 1922, did willfully and unlawfully have, keep, and store intoxicating liquors in a certain building situated in said city of Bakersfield, without having a valid permit so to do, contrary to the provisions of section 6 of Ordinance No. 64 of said city, and contrary to the statutes of the state of California; that pursuant to said complaint and a warrant issued thereunder, petitioner was arraigned in said court and his trial upon said charge set for February 1, 1923. This proceeding is instituted for the purpose of securing a writ of prohibition, directed to the respondent, restraining him from proceeding with the trial of said action, and comes before us on a demurrer to the petition.

Petitioner bases his right to said writ upon the ground that the said Ordinance No. 64 of the city of Bakersfield is in conflict with the general laws of the state of California, that is to say, the Wright Act, passed by the Legislature of the state, and which became effective December 21, 1922, after its approval by the voters of the state (St. 1921, p. 79). In support of his argument against the validity of said ordinance, petitioner contends that the Wright Act covers the same matters and prohibits the same acts as are sought to be covered and prohibited by the ordinance in question; that the penalty prescribed by said ordinance for said offense fixes a greater punishment than is prescribed by the state law for the same offense; and therefore said ordinance is in violation of section 11, art. 11 of the Constitution of the state.

Ordinance No. 64 is set forth in full in the petition, and section 6 thereof reads as follows:

> "It shall be unlawful for any person to have, keep, or store any intoxicating liquor in any public or semipublic place in the said city, except as provided herein."

Said ordinance further provides as a penalty for its violation a fine of not less than $250 nor more than $500, or by imprisonment in the county jail for a period of not more than 180 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Section 2 of the Wright Act provides:

> "All acts or omissions prohibited or declared unlawful by the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, or by the Volstead Act are hereby prohibited and declared unlawful; and violations thereof are subject to the penalties provided in the Volstead Act."

Section 3 of title 2 of the Volstead Act (41 Stat. 308) reads as follows:

> "No person shall, on or after the date when the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States goes into effect, manufacture, sell, barter, transport, import, export, deliver, furnish or possess any intoxicating liquor, except as authorized in this act," etc.

The Volstead Act fixes the punishment for possession of intoxicating liquors contrary to its provisions at a fine of not more than $500 for the first offense.

While the section of the Volstead Act as enacted by the Wright Act is not exactly in the same words as section 6 of the ordinance of the city of Bakersfield, we will assume for the purposes of this appeal that the same subject-matter is covered by both the statute and the ordinance. Petitioner so maintains, and it is not seriously controverted by the respondent.

[1] The question then arises: Is the ordinance in conflict with the state law and therefore rendered void by the provisions of article 11, § 11 of the Constitution, which provides that police power is thereby delegated to cities to enact such regulations as are not in conflict with the general laws?

Much of the discussion by counsel in their briefs is obviated by a late decision of the Supreme Court, reported in 214 Pac. 850, and entitled In the Matter of the Application of Arthur Mingo for a Writ of Habeas Corpus. In that proceeding the Supreme Court had under consideration an ordinance of the county of Kings, adopted prior to the enactment of the Wright Act, making it unlawful to have intoxicating liquors in one's possession and prescribing a greater penalty for such offense than that prescribed by the Wright Act. The court called attention in that case to the difference in the penalty imposed by the act and that imposed by the ordinance. For the first offense under the Wright Act the penalty was a fine not exceeding $500. Under the ordinance the maximum penalty prescribed was a fine of $500 and imprisonment for 90 days. And the court held that an ordinance punishing exactly the same offense as is punishable under the state law, and with a greater penalty is void.

The ordinance considered by the court in the last-named case is in all its essential features, so far as this proceeding is concerned, similar to the ordinance of the city of Bakersfield under consideration. And following the conclusions reached by the Supreme Court in that case we must hold that section 6 of the ordinance of the city of Bakersfield is void.

[2] Were this the only question before us, it would be our plain duty to grant the writ as prayed for by petitioner and restrain the respondent from the trial of said action. But there is another feature of the case which, in our opinion, is worthy of attention and the correct consideration of which leads us to an entirely different action.

The nature of the proceeding in the Mingo Case, supra, differed from that now before us. The Mingo Case, supra, was an application for a writ of habeas corpus after the defendant had been convicted and after sentence of imprisonment had been imposed upon him, and while he was serving imprisonment under said sentence. The present proceeding, as we have already seen, is one in which the petitioner asks for a writ of prohibition against respondent, restraining him from the trial of said action, on the ground that the court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. In the Mingo Case, supra, the court says:

> "The mere fact that the complaint alleged a violation of the county ordinance instead of the state law would not render the judgment void in so far as the facts alleged and proved show a violation of the law (Ex parte Murphy [Cal. Sup.] 212 Pac. 30; Matter of Von Perhacs [Cal. Sup.] 212 Pac. 689); but in the case at bar the sentence of imprisonment was not authorized by the state law."

In re Murphy, supra, the petitioner sought to secure his release from custody after conviction for operating an automobile carelessly and recklessly on a public street. He had been charged with the violation of a certain ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco. It was held that the Motor Vehicle Act of the state (St. 1919, p. 191) covered the whole field of traffic regulation, that the ordinance in question sought to prohibit the same act as the Motor Vehicle Act had prohibited, and was in conflict with the statute and void, but that the prisoner was not entitled to his discharge on habeas corpus because of the invalidity of said ordinance, where the complaint in said action recited an act forbidden by the Motor Vehicle Act, and the judgment of conviction was legal under the terms of said act. The complaint recited that the acts complained of were in violation of certain provisions of the ordinance. Nevertheless, the court held that while the complaint "was not in the exact language of the Motor Vehicle Act, it is in substance the same and could not have failed to inform the prisoner of the nature of his offense, and it clearly recited an act forbidden by the Motor Vehicle Act."

That case goes further than it is necessary for us to go in the present proceeding. There, the petitioner had been convicted and was sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail. In our case, no judgment has been rendered. The petitioner has simply been charged with an offense and the respondent was proceeding to try him for the offense charged. Under the authority of In re Murphy, supra, the respondent may proceed to hold said trial, provided the complaint in said action, although purporting to state an offense under the ordinance, does in fact state an offense under the Wright Act, and this is so, even if the ordinance is void. When we compare the complaint with the provisions of the Volstead Act, which the Wright Act has made the law of this state, we are satisfied that it states an offense thereunder. In fact, the main contention of petitioner is that the offense set out in the complaint is prohibited both by the Wright Act and the ordinance. As hereinbefore indicated, we have agreed with him in this contention, and have held the ordinance void for the reason that it attempts to legislate upon the same matter covered by the statutes of the state. The complaint, however, still stands as a perfectly valid complaint under the Wright Act, and therefore the respondent, in whose court said complaint was made, has jurisdiction to proceed with the trial of the defendant for the offense charged.

[3] It is suggested by petitioner that the offense stated in the complaint is in violation of section 21 of title 2 of the Volstead Act, and that section 21 provides for a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment of not more than one year, or both, and therefore the respondent would have no jurisdiction of such a proceeding. Said section 21 provides that any room or building where intoxicating liquor is manufactured or sold in violation of that act is a common nuisance and that any person who maintains the same is guilty of a misdemeanor, etc. In our opinion, by no reasonable construction of the complaint can it be held to state an offense under this section of the Volstead Act. We are therefore unable to agree with this last suggestion of the petitioner.

As stated before, the complaint in this proceeding states an offense under the Wright Act, and one within the jurisdiction of respondent.

The demurrer is sustained and petition denied.

CHAVEZ et al. v. SCULLY et al. (Civ. 4244.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 28, 1923.)

Appeal and error ⚷879—Attorney held not to have sufficient interest in judgment to sustain an appearance by him on his own behalf.

Where a decree in an action in partition adjudged and proportioned among the various counsel the attorneys' fees allowable as part of the costs, held, that one of such attorneys, after his dismissal, did not have a sufficient interest in the case to warrant an appearance by him on his own behalf on appeal in a proceeding to have the judgment wherein he was awarded attorneys' fees set aside.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; William H. Ellis, Judge.

Action by Federico Chavez and others against Thomas J. Scully and others. On motion to strike out reply to defendant's opening brief on appeal by plaintiffs. Motion granted.

Harry M. Irwin, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Sarau & Thompson, of Riverside, and J. Wiseman Macdonald, of Los Angeles, for York.

CURTIS, J. The original action was one in partition. A final decree was entered therein and provided, among other things, that a certain amount should be allowed the parties as attorneys' fees, and then proceeded to apportion said amount to the several attorneys in the case, among whom was Waldo M. York, one of the attorneys for the plaintiffs, who was given one-fourth of the aggregate amount allowed as counsel fees. After the entry of said final decree, two of the plaintiffs, discovering that an error had been committed therein, were dissatisfied with the decree and immediately took steps to have the same corrected. Waldo M. York and Harry M. Irwin had acted as their attorneys during the pendency of the action. Following their decision to attempt to have the decree corrected, they substituted the said Harry M. Irwin as their attorney in the place of the said Waldo M. York and Harry M. Irwin. They thereupon gave notice of motion to set aside and vacate the decree. The court denied the motion and they have appealed to this court from said order denying their motion.

On this appeal, a brief was filed by Messrs. Sarau & Thompson, attorneys for the said Waldo M. York, and in his behalf, entitled "Reply to Appellants' Opening Brief," and the appellants now move this court to strike said brief from the files of this court.

It is contended that said Waldo M. York is not a party to said action and does not have any interest therein sufficient to entitle him to appear or to be heard on this appeal.

The decree, as we have already seen, attempts to fix the amount of attorneys' fees to which each of the attorneys in the case would be entitled. It therefore amounts to an order or judgment in favor of the several attorneys for the respective amounts thereby apportioned to them. If the court had authority to make such a decree, then the attorneys would be entitled to enforce the same, and, if the decree were assailed, to defend it against any attacks made thereon, consistent with their duty to their clients.

The authority to allow counsel fees in partition actions is derived from section 796 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This section reads as follows:

> "Costs of Partition a Lien Upon Shares of Parceners.—The costs of partition, including reasonable counsel fees, expended by the plaintiff or either of the defendants, for the common benefit, fees of referees, and other disbursements, must be paid by the parties respectively entitled to share in the lands divided, in proportion to their respective interests therein, and may be included and specified in the judgment. In that case they shall be a lien on the several shares, and the judgment may be enforced by execution against such shares, and against other property held by the respective parties."

It does not appear that this section of the Code of Civil Procedure has ever been before the appellate courts of this state for construction, relative to the power given therein to the court to fix or allow attorneys' fees. It will be observed, however, that the section provides only that counsel fees may be included in the costs of partition expended by either plaintiff or defendant for the common benefit of all the parties to the action, and that they must be paid by the parties respectively entitled to share in the land divided. The fact that counsel fees are placed in the same category with other costs of suit expended by the parties would indicate that this provision of the Code was made for the protection and reimbursement of the parties, and then only after such costs and attorneys' fees had been paid, or at least incurred. Any decree, therefore, made in accordance with this section should run in favor of the parties to the action and not to those to whom the parties may have became liable for costs, etc.; otherwise, the decree of partition might provide not only for the payment to the attorneys in the case of their attorneys' fees, but also for the payment to the reporter, the referee, the witnesses, and any other persons to whom any of the parties may have become legally liable for services rendered, which could be properly included in the costs of the action. We apprehend that no one will contend that the section will bear any such construction, yet to maintain that the decree could provide for the payment of attorneys' fees to the attorneys in the action would in our opinion tend to just such a result.

Statutes similar to the section of the Code now under consideration have frequently been before the Supreme Court of this state, and that court has invariably held that, where the court is given authority to allow attorneys' fees in certain actions or proceedings, such allowance must be made to the party to the action, and it has annulled and declared void in every instance, as far as our information goes, orders and decrees made directly in favor of the attorneys.

In a divorce action under the authority of section 137 of the Civil Code, the court ordered attorneys' fees paid to the plaintiff's attorneys. The Supreme Court set aside the order and in doing so used the following language:

> "Section 137 regulates the matter in this state, and that section contemplates an order to pay to the wife. * * * When awarded, either by statute or upon general principles, 'suit money' is awarded to her; and by section 137 counsel fees, if ordered to be paid, are ordered as part of her necessary expenses for prosecuting or defending the action for divorce.

> * * * The order here was a direct judgment for money in favor of persons not parties to the suit, and to that extent was irregular and void." Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, 16 Pac. 345.

In Sullivan v. Gage, 145 Cal. 759, 79 Pac. 537, the court directed the attorney fees to be paid to the attorneys for the receiver and the order was held by the Supreme Court to be defective and was set aside on the ground that the order should have run in favor of the receiver and not his attorneys.

In the Estate of Levinson, 108 Cal. 450, 41 Pac. 483, 42 Pac. 479, an allowance of $500 was ordered paid to the attorneys of the administrator. On appeal the Supreme Court struck out this allowance on the ground that it should have been made to the administrator and not to the attorney.

In Briggs v. Breen, 123 Cal. 657, 56 Pac. 633, 886, it was held that the estate is not liable to an attorney, and the allowance for attorney's fees is made to the executor or administrator and not to the attorney.

In the Estate of Kruger, 143 Cal. on page 144, 76 Pac. 891, on page 892, the court states the law to be as follows:

> "It is well settled that whatever allowance is to be made from the estate to the executor or administrator for the services of his attorney must be made to the executor or administrator, and cannot be made to the attorney." (Citing cases.) "The attorney employed by an executor or administrator to assist him in the execution of his trust has no claim that he can enforce against the estate either by action * * * or in any other way. * * * His claim is solely against his client, the executor or administrator. He is not by reason of such employment the attorney of the estate, but is simply the attorney of the executor or administrator who selects and employs him. * * * He is not a 'person interested in the estate' within the meaning of those words as used in the section relative to the presentation of exceptions to the accounts of the executor or administrator and the conclusiveness of decrees of settlement of such accounts. * * * He therefore cannot legally file exceptions to an account, for only parties 'interested in the estate' may do so, * * * and exceptions filed by him are ineffectual for any purpose. (Briggs v. Breen, 123 Cal. 657.)"

The cases of In re Levinson, Briggs v. Breen, and Estate of Kruger, supra, were decided, however, prior to the amendment of section 1619 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that attorneys for executors and administrators shall be allowed out of the estate fees for their own services rendered the estate. As the section now stands and has stood since its amendement in 1909, an order of the court directly in favor of an attorney for his fees in the estate might be assumed to be legal, but this would be due to the positive direction of the code section in favor of attorneys in probate proceedings. These authorities would indicate that the decree, in so far as it purports to allow to the attorneys certain fees for their services, is to that extent invalid. It would therefore not give the said attorneys any personal interest in the judgment. Having no such interest therein, they would have no right to appear in the case representing simply themselves and not their clients, or to be heard in any proceeding to annul or set aside the decree.

There is another ground set forth in paragraph II of appellants' points and authorities accompanying their motion and advanced by counsel as a reason why the brief filed by Sarau & Thompson should be stricken from the files of this court. We have carefully considered the argument of counsel in support of this additional ground, and have also examined the brief sought to be stricken from the files of the court. We find nothing in said brief that warrants the attack made against it by counsel for appellants, and in granting the motion to dismiss the same, we do not wish to be understood that we concur in any manner with the argument of counsel made in behalf of his motion and contained in said paragraph II of his said points and authorities.

The motion will be granted solely on the ground that the party for whom Sarau & Thompson appear as attorneys has no interest in said action sufficient to entitle him to appear herein, or to be heard on this appeal.

Appellants' motion is hereby granted, and the brief hereinbefore referred to, and entitled "Reply to Appellants' Opening Brief," is hereby stricken from the files of this court.

WARFIELD v. BASSO et al. (Civ. 4151.)

1. Pleading 🔑193(8)—Mistaken rule by which damages sought will not invalidate pleading.

Where facts stated in a complaint show plaintiff is entitled to damages of some sort, it was not a fatal error that the pleader has mistaken the rule by which such damages should be determined.

2. Courts 🔑122—Jurisdiction determined by amount of judgment in good faith demanded.

Jurisdiction of a court is to be determined by the amount for which judgment in good faith is demanded.

3. Frauds, statute of 🔑148(1) — Allegation that contract which statute required to be in writing was in writing is unnecessary.

In an action on a contract, required by the statute to be in writing, the presumption is that the contract is in writing, and there is no necessity for an allegation in the complaint to that effect, and a complaint alleging "said defendants entered into an agreement and contract with the plaintiff herein," was sufficient, particularly in view of the further allegation that a partial payment had been made which, under Civ. Code, §§ 1624, 1739, would take the transaction without the statute.

4. Sales 🔑202(1)—Transaction held sufficient to constitute sale of automobile, although full payment not made in cash.

Under Civ. Code, § 1721, defining a sale, a transaction looking to the sale of an automobile truck held sufficient to constitute a sale, though the seller accepted only a part payment in cash, coupled with an agreement to accept another automobile as additional payment, with the balance to be paid in installments; full payment not being necessary to complete the transaction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Action by C. F. Warfield against Domenick Basso and Eugene Guasti, copartners doing business as Basso & Guasti. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hocker & Austin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

D. M. Potter nad A. J. Getz, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. Plaintiff commenced an action against defendants by filing a complaint, which, after the formal parts thereof, contained the following allegations:

> "That on said 3d day of February, 1922, said defendants were the owners of and in possession of one certain Chevrolet automobile truck, Model No. 490, of the reasonable value of $658.80, and on said day and date, said defendants entered into an agreement and contract with the plaintiff herein, by the terms of which said defendant sold and agreed to deliver unto plaintiff said automobile truck, in consideration of the payment of the sum of $658.80, payable as follows: Eight dollars and eighty cents in cash money, and one certain Overland automobile valued by said defendants at $300, and the further sum of $350, to be paid in 12 equal monthly installments, and said automobile truck to be delivered to plaintiff upon delivery of said Overland automobile and the payment of said sum of $8.80, in money.
> "That plaintiff, on said 3d day of February, 1922, paid to said defendants the sum of $8.80, a portion of said price of said Chevrolet automobile truck, and said defendants received said sum of $8.80, a part of the purchase money of said automobile truck; and plaintiff tendered and offered to deliver to defendants, said Overland automobile, and was and is now able, ready, and willing to pay said installment payments, and in all things carry out the conditions of said contract on his part to be performed.
> "That on the 6th day of February, 1922, made such tender and offer to deliver said automobile, and then and there made written demand, that said truck be delivered to plaintiff, but said defendants refused to deliver said truck, and shortly afterwards, within 30 days, subsequent to said 3d day of February, 1922, as plaintiff is informed, and has good reason to believe and does believe, the defendants sold and parted with the possession of said automobile truck, and placed it beyond their power to deliver the same to plaintiff, to his damage in the sum of $658.80, the value of said automobile truck.
> "That plaintiff purchased said automobile truck, for his own use, in his business, for hauling, and at the time of making said contract with the defendants so informed defendants of such fact, and that such an automobile truck was necessary for use in the business of plaintiff. That the reasonable value of the use of said automobile truck, in plaintiff's business, is $2 per day, and by reason of the failure of defendants to deliver said automobile truck to plaintiff, pursuant to the terms of their said agreement, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $2 per day, for the time since said February 3, 1922, or an aggregate sum of $400.
> "That said defendants have not, nor has any person on their behalf, paid either said damage of $658.80, nor $400, nor any part thereof.
> "Wherefore, plaintiff prays the judgment of the court, and the plaintiff recover of the defendants and each of them the sum of $1,058.80, and costs of suit."

Defendants demurred to the complaint, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against defendants. The court made an order sustaining the demurrer, and it was further ordered that the plaintiff be and he was given ten days from the date of the order within which to amend his complaint. More than ten days thereafter having elapsed, and plaintiff not having filed an amended complaint in the action, judgment was ordered that plaintiff take nothing by reason of his complaint and that defendants recover their costs. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

[1] In support of the judgment, one of the objections which is urged against the complaint is that the damages claimed therein are not such as are provided by the statutes covering a transaction of the nature outlined in the complaint; but the rule of law is that where the facts stated in the complaint show that the plaintiff is entitled to damages of some sort, it is not a fatal error that the pleader has mistaken the rule by which such damages should be determined.

In Hudson v. Archer, 4 S. D. 128, 55 N. W. 1099, which was an appeal from an order sustaining a demurrer to a complaint, the court said:

> "As we have seen, an erroneous claim for damages or demand for relief is not a ground of demurrer. If the rule by which the damages are to be estimated as stated in the complaint is incorrect or insufficient, the defect cannot be reached by demurrer so long as the complaint states facts entitling the plaintiffs to recover any damages in the action."

Regarding a like question in Kraft v. Rice, 45 App. Div. 596, 61 N. Y. Supp. 368, it is said:

> "We agree with the court below in the statement of the rule relating to the sufficiency of a pleading on contract, that, if it clearly sets forth a contract and its breach, even though the theory of damages predicated thereon may be erroneous, it would be a statement of a good cause of action. * * * If, in addition to the contract, a breach was alleged, then the plaintiff would be entitled to at least nominal damages, and the complaint would not be demurrable."

In Colrick v. Swinburne, 105 N. Y. 503, 12 N. E. 427, the opinion of the court contains the following:

> "It is not material that the plaintiff did not demand the precise damages to which he was entitled, or that he mistook the true rule of damages in his complaint. The complaint averred a legal wrong and a resulting pecuniary injury, and it was competent for the court, under the complaint, to adjust the recovery upon the true basis."

And see the following cases: International & G. N. R. Co. v. Gordon, 72 Tex. 44, 11 S. W. 1033; Harmon v. Callahan (Tex. Civ. App.) 35 S. W. 705.

[2] That the jurisdiction of the court is determined by the amount for which judgment, in good faith, is demanded in the complaint, is so well settled in this state that an enumeration of authorities on that question would not serve any useful purpose.

[3] For the reason that the alleged agreement was not in writing, it is contended that there can be no recovery. The allegation of the complaint with reference thereto is that on a certain date "said defendants entered into an agreement and contract with the plaintiff herein," etc. The authorities of this state are numerous which hold that, in an action on a contract, required by the statute of frauds to be in writing, the presumption is that the contract is in writing, and there is no necessity for an allegation in the complaint to that effect. Alaska Salmon Co. v. Standard Box Co., 158 Cal. 567, 112 Pac. 454; Bradford Investment Co. v. Joost, 117 Cal. 204, 48 Pac. 1083; Curtiss v. Ætna Life Ins. Co., 90 Cal. 245, 27 Pac. 211, 25 Am. St. Rep. 114; Barnard v. Lloyd, 85 Cal. 131, 24 Pac. 658; McMenomy v. Talbot, 84 Cal. 279, 23 Pac. 1099; Broder v. Conklin, 77 Cal. 330, 19 Pac. 513; Nunez v. Morgan, 77 Cal. 427, 19 Pac. 753.

Moreover, it is alleged in the complaint:

> "That plaintiff, on said 3d day of February, 1922, paid to said defendants the sum of $8.80, a portion of said purchase price of said Chevrolet automobile truck, and said defendants received said sum of $8.80, a part of the purchase money of said automobile truck."

It is a general rule that under an oral contract for the sale of personal property part payment of the agreed purchase price will take the contract out of the statute of frauds. Note to the case of Driggs v. Bush (Mich.) 125 Am. St. Rep. 395, where many cases are cited. In addition thereto, we have positive declaration to like effect contained within our statute. Section 1624 of the Civil Code provides, in substance, that such oral contract is invalid "unless the buyer * * * pays at the time some part of the purchase money." And section 1739, Civil Code, contains the following:

> "No sale of personal property, or agreement to buy or sell it for a price of two hundred dollars or more, is valid, unless: * * *
> "(3) The buyer, at the time of sale, pays a part of the price."

[4] Assuming the allegations of the complaint to be true, the transaction between the parties amounted to a sale by the defendants to the plaintiff, notwithstanding the fact that there was only a part payment in cash, coupled with an agreement to accept another automobile as additional payment, with the balance to be paid in installments. Lambert v. McCloud, 63 Cal. 162, 164; Cutting Fruit Packing Co. v. Canty, 141 Cal. 692, 75 Pac. 564; Mansfield v. District Agricultural Ass'n, 154 Cal. 145, 97 Pac. 150.

Neither delivery to the plaintiff of the automobile in question, nor full payment thereof, was necessary to complete the sale as between the parties to the transaction. Civ. Code, § 1721; Johnson v. Dixon Farms Co., 29 Cal. App. 52, 155 Pac. 134, 136; Hamilton v. Klinke, 42 Cal. App. 426, 183 Pac. 675; Young v. New Pedrara Onyx Co., 48 Cal. App. 1, 192 Pac. 55.

It follows that the complaint states a cause of action.

Judgment reversed.

SCHLITZ et al. v. THOMAS et al.
(Civ. 2571.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 11, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 7, 1923.)

1. Guaranty 🔑100, 105—Principal and surety 🔑183, 194(6½)—Subrogation 🔑21—Payment must be under compulsion to entitle guarantor or surety to reimbursement contribution, or subrogation.

To entitle a guarantor or surety to reimbursement, contribution, or subrogation on account of payments made in behalf of his principal, it must appear that such payments were made under compulsion; that is, under a legal obligation and not as a mere volunteer.

2. Subrogation 🔑21—Payment must have been under necessity to entitle payor to "subrogation."

One of the principles lying at the foundation of subrogation in equity is that the person seeking subrogation must have paid the debt under some necessity to save himself from loss which might arise or accrue to him by the enforcement of the debt in the hands of the original creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Subrogation.]

3. Corporations 🔑269(1)—Indorsers of corporate note suing stockholders must show legal liability for payments made.

In an action by indorsers on the note of a corporation to compel the stockholders of such corporation to reimburse plaintiffs for the amount paid, the burden is on plaintiffs to show that they were legally liable to make such payment.

4. Corporations 🔑268(5)—Stockholders sued for corporate note paid by indorsers may show under general denial that note was barred by limitations at time of payment.

In an action by indorsers of a corporate note against stockholders, to recover the amount paid by plaintiffs, the defense that the note was barred by limitations at the time of the alleged payment by indorsers need not be pleaded by defendants, but was available under a general denial; such fact, if true, being merely evidence that the payment by the indorsers was voluntary and not under necessity.

5. Corporations 🔑237—Complaint by indorsers on corporate note against stockholders states no cause of action, where showing note to have been barred by limitations.

Where a complaint by indorsers on a corporate note against stockholders disclosed that at the time the indorsers paid the note it had become barred by limitations, the complaint failed to state a cause of action.

6. Evidence 🔑73—Stockholder not paying assessment, whose name does not appear on subsequent assessment delinquent list, presumed no longer stockholder.

It is presumed that a corporation followed the law with reference to the collection of assessments against stockholders and under Civ. Code, § 333, providing that no assessment must be levied while a previous one remains unpaid, the absence of the name of a shareholder who had not paid a previous assessment from the list of delinquents under a subsequent assessment justifies the inference that the stock of such shareholder had been sold under a former assessment, or at least that the officers of the corporation so believed.

7. Corporations 🔑269(2)—In action to hold stockholders liable to indorsers paying corporate note, evidence tending to show sale of defendants' stock for nonpayment of assessments held admissible.

Where indorsers of the note of a corporation, including managing officers, sued alleged stockholders for the amount they were required to pay, and the evidence showed that many of the records had been lost or destroyed and that plaintiffs had in many respects conducted the business of the corporation in a very loose and irregular manner, a wide latitude should have been permitted in the cross-examination of the principal officers, and the exclusion on cross-examination of testimony sought to be elicited that would have tended to show that defendants' stock had been sold for nonpayment of assessments, and that certain of the plaintiffs had made admissions to that effect held erroneous, as was also the refusal of the court to permit defendants to prove that, after the sales of their respective shares, they made no claim and asserted no right in stock of the corporation.

8. Corporations 🔑243(7)—Irregularities in sale of stock for delinquent assessments does not preserve stockholders' liability to creditors.

Under Civ. Code, § 347, providing that no action can be sustained to recover stock sold for delinquent assessments for irregularities in such sale, unless the plaintiff pays or tenders the sum for which the same was sold, together with subsequent assessments paid thereon, and that no such action can be sustained unless commenced within six months after the sale, the fact that there had been mere irregularities in forfeiture and sale of a stockholder's share does not render the forfeiture invalid as against creditors of the corporation, where both the company and the shareholder treated the forfeiture as valid.

9. Corporations 🔑243(2)—Person whose name appears on corporate books as stockholder presumed to be such, but presumption rebuttable.

Under Const. art. 12, § 3, providing for individual liability of corporate stockholders, and Civ. Code, § 343, requiring entry of stock transfers to be made on corporate books, and section 322, making applicable the terms stockholder and member to equitable owners and to members whose names do not appear on the books, a person whose name appears on the books of the corporation is presumed to occupy that relation to the corporation which the books indicate, the entry, however, not being conclusive but presumptive, and while such person, though not the owner, may be required to respond to a creditor of the corporation, such liability is based, not upon ownership, but on grounds of estoppel to deny ownership.

10. Corporations 🔑243(10) — Circumstances stated under which there is and is not an estoppel to deny liability as stockholders.

To entitle indorsers of the note of a corporation, paid by them, to recover on the ground of estoppel, against stockholders whose names appeared as such on the books but whose shares had been sold to the corporation for nonpayment of assessments, it must appear that the indorsers knew of the admission of the relation as stockholders indicated by the books at the time they paid the note, that they did not know of the sale of the shares, and that they relied directly on such admission, and will be injured by allowing its truth to be disproved, but, where it affirmatively appears that some of the indorsers actually knew of the sale of the shares, and that the stockholders were no longer such, they could not have been misled by the stock records, since payment by them was not made in reliance on their liability, so that a necessary element of estoppel is wanting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by John J. Schlitz and others against Ben Thomas and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed with directions.

J. W. Wiley, of Bakersfield, for appellants.
C. L. Claflin and Claflin & Lambert, all of Bakersfield, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The complaint alleges that at all times therein mentioned the defendants were stockholders of the Delano Creamery Company, a corporation; that on November 28, 1914, the corporation executed its promissory note to the First National Bank of Bakersfield for $8,000, due one day after date; that at the same time the plaintiffs duly indorsed such note and guaranteed the payment thereof and any renewal of the same; that on the 21st day of July, 1916, the bank commenced an action against plaintiffs and others to enforce payment of the note, and, on the 13th day of February, 1918, it was given judgment against plaintiffs and the corporation for $10,107.10; and that on the 21st day of April, 1918, the plaintiffs paid the bank $10,541.27 in full satisfaction of the judgment.

For a second cause of action it is alleged that on the 1st day of December, 1912, the corporation executed its promissory note to the First National Bank of Delano for $4,000 due one day after date; that at the same time the plaintiffs duly indorsed the note and guaranteed the payment thereof and any renewal of the same; and that on the 1st day of July, 1918, the plaintiffs, as such indorsers and guarantors, paid the last-named bank $6,189.64. The complaint alleges that this action was commenced June 23, 1919, and contains appropriate allegations as to the number of shares of subscribed capital stock and the number owned by each defendant.

The answer of defendants Thomas, McHarvey, and Clark denies the execution of the notes by the corporation and the alleged payments by plaintiffs, and further denies that defendants were stockholders at any time after February —, 1916.

The evidence shows that the notes were executed and their payment guaranteed as alleged in the complaint; that the plaintiffs paid $10,445.10 in satisfaction of the alleged judgment in April, 1918; and that, in July, 1918, the plaintiffs paid $6,189.60 in satisfaction of a judgment rendered in an action by the First National Bank of Delano against R. J. Martin and others. The complaint does not allege the rendition or the payment of any such judgment, and the evidence does not show on what liability the judgment was based or whether the plaintiffs herein were parties to the action in which the judgment was rendered. Notwithstanding this variance between the allegations of the complaint and the evidence, and the further fact that the uncontradicted evidence shows that the amount paid by plaintiffs in satisfaction of the judgment alleged in the first cause of action was $96 less than alleged, the court found for plaintiffs in accordance with the allegations of the complaint and entered judgment accordingly. Thomas, McHarvey, E. C. Clark, and Mrs. Anna M. Smith, executrix, appeal from the judgment against them.

[1-3] Appellants contend that the liability of the corporation to pay the $4,000 note had been extinguished by the statute of limitations before the alleged payment thereof by plaintiffs and that therefore the payment was voluntary and gave plaintiffs no cause of action against the defendants. This contention must be sustained. To entitle a guarantor or surety to reimbursement, contribution, or subrogation on account of payments made in behalf of his principal, it must appear that such payments were made under compulsion; that is, under a legal obligation, and not as a mere volunteer. Stone v. Hammell, 83 Cal. 547, 23 Pac. 703, 8 L. R. A. 425, 17 Am. St. Rep. 272; Machado v. Fernandez, 74 Cal. 362, 16 Pac. 19; United States Fidelity, etc., Co. v. More, 155 Cal. 415, 101 Pac. 302; Easton v. Boston Investment Co., 51 Cal. App. 246, 196 Pac. 796.

> "One of the principles lying at the foundation of subrogation in equity, in addition to the one already stated, that the person seeking this subrogation must have paid the debt, is that he must have done this under some necessity, to save himself from loss which might arise or accrue to him by the enforcement of the debt in the hands of the original creditor." Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Middleport, 124 U. S. 534, 8 Sup. Ct. 625, 31 L. Ed. 537.

The burden was on the plaintiffs to show that they were legally liable to make the alleged payment. Easton v. Boston Investment Co., supra.

[4, 5] The defendants did not plead that the note was barred at the time of such payment. Plaintiffs' cause of action, if they have any, was not barred. It accrued at the time of the payment. Ryland v. Commercial, etc., Bank, 127 Cal. 525, 59 Pac. 989; Yule v. Bishop, 133 Cal. 574, 62 Pac. 68, 65 Pac. 1094. The objection here raised is not that plaintiffs' cause of action was barred but that no cause of action ever existed. The issue in this case is not whether the note was barred at the time of payment, but whether the payment was voluntary. The fact that the note was barred when paid by plaintiffs is merely evidence that the payment was voluntary. No reason appears why such evidence should have been pleaded by defendants, any more than that other evidence should have been so pleaded. Plaintiffs' second cause of action not only fails to show that the alleged payment was made under necessity, but affirmatively shows that it was made without any legal necessity. It therefore failed to state a cause of action. In Bailey v. Bussings, 29 Conn. 1, it is said that the form of action for contribution—

> "is usually that of the count in general indebitatus assumpsit for money paid, laid out, and expended, which is, for several reasons, the most advisable form of declaring in such cases; but where a special count is adopted, it in no case states merely the existence of a legal liability on the part of the defendant to contribute to the amount paid by the plaintiff, but invariably alleges the facts on which such liability arose."

In Smith v. Faris-Kesl Const. Co., 27 Idaho, 407, 430, 150 Pac. 25, 32, the court said:

> "That facts must be alleged upon which the claim to the right of subrogation is based is a rule so elementary and universal that no authorities need be cited to support it."

E. 154; Johnson v. Goldsby, 32 Mo. App. 560; First Nat. Bank v. Thompson, 61 N. J. Eq. 188, 48 Atl. 333; Sherk v. First Nat. Bank (Tex. Civ. App.) 152 S. W. 832.

Appellants contend that the evidence does not support the finding that they were stockholders at the time of either alleged payment. During the year 1915 the corporation levied three assessments upon the capital stock thereof. Plaintiff John J. Schlitz testified that he had been secretary of the corporation for five or six years; that the minutes of the board of directors' meetings were written on loose sheets and laid away, "and a great many of those records were destroyed at the time my office burned in 1918"; that "none of the directors paid any attention to the creamery business except Frank, Mr. Hawley, and myself. I guess we run the whole thing for awhile." Notices of the three assessments and notices of shareholders who were delinquent in the payment of such assessments, as published in a local newspaper, were admitted in evidence. Each notice of assessment recited that such assessment had been levied at a special meeting of the board of directors, the dates of such meetings being stated as May 10th, August 21st, and December 20th, respectively in the year 1915. The first delinquency notice, after enumerating the delinquent shareholders, the number of shares owned by them respectively, and the amounts of their unpaid assessments, stated that, "in accordance with law, and an order of the board of directors made on the 17th day of June, 1915, so many shares of each parcel of such stock as may be necessary will be sold at public auction at the office of John J. Schlitz, on I street, in the town of Delano, Cal., on the 19th day of July, 1915, at the hour of 2:00 p. m. of said day, to pay said delinquent assessment thereon, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale." The notice was signed by John J. Schlitz as secretary. The other delinquent notices were in the same form and contained similar recitals. The second notice fixed the time of sale at October 18, 1915, and the third at February 29, 1916. The names of Clark and McHarvey appear as delinquents in the first notice but not in the others. They paid no assessment. Archie Smith's name appears in the second notice but not in the last. He paid the first assessment only. Thomas paid the first two assessments but not the last. He is listed as delinquent in the last notice. Section 333 of the Civil Code provides, in so far as applicable to the facts of this case, that—

> "No assessment must be levied while any portion of a previous one remains unpaid, unless: 1. The power of the corporation has been exercised in accordance with the provisions of this article for the purpose of collecting such previous assessment."

[6, 7] It is to be presumed that the corporation followed the law, and the absence of the name of a shareholder, who had not paid one assessment, from the list of delinquents under a subsequent assessment, justifies the inference that the stock of such shareholder had been sold under the former assessment, or at least that the officers of the corporation so believed. Schlitz testified that no one appeared at any of the delinquent sales to purchase the stock of delinquent shareholders; that he and the president of the corporation were present at the times and places fixed for the sales; and that the same procedure was had in each instance. Relative to the first sale he testified:

"When the time came for the sale, I think the president, my son, was there at my office. Nothing was said about the stock being delinquent. No one was there to bid. Q. Now isn't it a fact when no one was there to bid, you said between yourselves, * * * 'There is nobody here, strike it off to the corporation,' or you let your son bid it in for the corporation at the assessment price? A. Nothing was said about that."

The attention of the witness was directed to the following question and answer in a prior examination:

"Q. You sold their stock, didn't you, and the corporation bid it in for the assessment? A. I don't know if we did or not, we did in a way; it was presumed to be sold; yes."

His examination at the trial then proceeded:

"Q. Did you make that statement or give that testimony? A. I did. This is still correct. * * * I presume there was no stock sold, there was no stock sold as far as I know, not a share to anybody. * * * Q. You as secretary and your son Frank as president took it for granted that the proceedings there amounted to a sale, is that right? A. That is the idea. * * * Q. Do you remember that during the summer of 1918, you had your office in the same room, in the Masonic Temple with Fred Waite? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you remember a conversation during that time in the presence of yourself and Mr. Fred Waite, discussing these creamery matters generally and the various assessments, and you told him that nobody ever came to these sales, that Frank was there as president and just bought the delinquent stock in for the company?

"Mr. Claflin: Object to that as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not proper cross-examination."

The court sustained the objection. The stock book of the corporation had been admitted in evidence on the direct examination of the witness, and he had testified concerning it:

"So far as I know, this book is the complete record of the stock ownership of this corporation."

The names of defendants appeared therein as stockholders. The question to which objection was sustained was certainly proper cross-examination and very material to defendants' case. All the plaintiffs were stockholders and several were directors. The business of the corporation had been conducted in a very loose and irregular manner. Schlitz testified that he handled "all the official conduct of the corporation." He was uncertain whether a quorum of the directors were present when the assessments were levied. Much of his testimony is wholly at variance with the facts stated in the notices which he signed and caused to be published and much more favorable to his present contentions as a plaintiff. Many of his records had been burned prior to the trial. Under all these circumstances, the defendants were entitled to the fullest latitude in cross-examining the witness. The court also refused to permit defendants to prove that after the sales of their respective shares of stock to the corporation they did not make any claim or assert any right or interest therein. This evidence was admissible as tending to show, together with the other facts stated, that both the corporation and the defendants had acquiesced in the sales of the latter's stock and had treated such sales as valid. Section 347 of the Civil Code provides:

"Action for Recovery of Stock, and Limitation Thereof. No action must be sustained to recover stock sold for delinquent assessments, upon the ground of irregularity in the assessment, irregularity or defect of the notice of sale, or defect or irregularity in the sale, unless the party seeking to maintain such action first pays or tenders to the corporation, or the party holding the stock sold, the sum for which the same was sold, together with all subsequent assessments which may have been paid thereon and interest on such sums from the time they were paid; and no such action must be sustained unless the same is commenced by the filing of a complaint and the issuing of a summons thereon within six months after such sale was made."

[8] More than two years had elapsed from the last sale of delinquent stock to the first alleged payment by plaintiffs. Under the provisions of section 347 the defendants had waived any rights they may have had to recover the stock. In American Well, etc., Co. v. Blakemore, 184 Cal. 343, 348, 193 Pac. 779, 781 (19 A. L. R. 1087), in discussing a similar question, the court said:

"The following quotation from Crissey v. Cook, 67 Kan. 20, 72 Pac. 541, is also pertinent: 'If the forfeiture is invalid in respect of something which the parties cannot waive, and which cannot be cured by their acquiescence, he remains liable to the company's creditors in the event of its insolvency. On the other hand, where there had been a mere irregularity in making a bona fide forfeiture within the company's powers, as by failing to give him the prescribed notice, or to pass a formal resolution of forfeiture, but only an entry to that effect on the corporate books has been made by the secretary, yet, if both the company and the shareholder treat the forfeiture as valid, it will be held as such against the company's creditors.' "

The secretary, Schlitz, testified that he did not notify the directors of any of the special meetings held by them, though it does not appear whether they were otherwise notified. It also appears that he assumed authority to publish the delinquent notices without having been formally authorized to do so by the directors. A corporation, however, is presumed to have knowledge of the acts of its president and secretary in the conduct of its business. The corporation and the defendants treated the assessments and sales as as valid and any irregularities therein must be deemed to have been waived. Whether or not the evidence was such as to require a finding that defendants were not stockholders at the time of the alleged payments by plaintiffs, the exclusion of the offered testimony was prejudicial error.

[9] Respondents contend that, if it be conceded that the corporation purchased defendants' stock at the delinquent sales, the defendants are still liable by reason of the fact that no entry of the transfer was made on the books of the corporation as required by section 343 of the Civil Code. Section 3, art. 12, of the Constitution, provides:

> "Each stockholder of a corporation, or joint-stock association, shall be individually and personally liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred, during the time he was a stockholder, as the amount of stock or shares owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock, or shares of the corporation or association."

Section 322 of the Civil Code as amended by St. 1917, p. 786, contains similar provisions and provides:

> "The terms 'stockholder' and 'member,' as used in this section, applies not only to such persons as appear by the books of the corporation to be such, but also to every equitable owner of stock or of a membership, although the same appears on the books in the name of another."

Where the name of a person appears as a stockholder on the books of the corporation—

> "the presumption is that he occupies the relation to the corporation which the books indicate. The entry is, however, not conclusive, but presumptive merely." Welch v. Gillelen, 147 Cal. 571, 575, 82 Pac. 248, 249; Nat. Bank, etc., v. Western Pac. Ry. Co., 157 Cal. 573, 108 Pac. 676, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 987, 21 Ann. Cas. 1391; Shean v. Cook, 180 Cal. 92, 179 Pac. 185, 5 A. L. R. 1042; Realty & Rebuilding Co. v. Rea, 184 Cal. 565, 194 Pac. 1024.

While such person—

> "though not the owner, may be required to respond to a creditor of the corporation, such liability is based, not upon ownership, but upon grounds of estoppel to deny ownership." Hughes Mfg., etc., Co. v. Wilcox, 13 Cal. App. 22, 28, 108 Pac. 871, 873.

[10] The presence of a person's name on the books of a corporation as a stockholder is in the nature of a declaration or admission that he is such. To entitle plaintiffs to recover on the grounds of estoppel, it must appear that they knew of such admission at the time of payment, otherwise they could not have been misled by it (Shean v. Cook, supra), that they were without knowledge of the sales to the corporation (Boggs v. Merced M. Co., 14 Cal. 279), and that they "relied directly upon such admission, and will be injured by allowing its truth to be disproved" (Boggs v. Merced Min. Co., supra; Bowman v. Cudworth, 31 Cal. 148; Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 266, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674; Conway v. Supreme Council, 137 Cal. 384, 70 Pac. 223; Williams v. Williams, 170 Cal. 625, 151 Pac. 10; Frank v. Crescent Wharf & Warehouse Co., 50 Cal. App. 272, 195 Pac. 79). It affirmatively appears that some of the plaintiffs had actual knowledge of the sales and therefore could not have been misled by the stock records. None of the plaintiffs suffered any injury from the failure to enter the transfers on the books. They extended no credit in reliance on the book entries. Any payments made by them, which created a liability against the stockholders, were not made in reliance upon the presumption that the defendants were stockholders, but in the discharge of the obligation they assumed when they became guarantors. Knowledge on their part of the true ownership of the stock would not have enabled them to escape any part of that obligation, and therefore a necessary element of estoppel is wanting.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, with directions to the trial court to permit the plaintiffs to amend their complaint, if so advised.

KERSHAW v. MADSEN. (Civ. 4523.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 30, 1923.)

1. Witnesses 🔑195—Declarations to plaintiff by his deceased wife during marriage held inadmissible in action to establish trust in real property.

In an action seeking to establish and enforce an implied trust in real property conveyed to defendant by plaintiff's deceased wife, who had previously been defendant's ward, evidence as to declarations made to plaintiff by his deceased wife during the existence of their marriage relation as to her intent in making the conveyance was properly excluded, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 1, forbidding either husband or wife, without consent of the other, to be examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage.

2. Evidence 🔑271(15)—Declarations to third persons by grantor in deed held inadmissible as self-serving.

Where plaintiff's deceased wife, who had previously been a ward of defendant, had, after the guardianship terminated, transferred real property to defendant, declarations by such wife to persons other than her husband or defendant, and not in defendant's presence, as to her intent in making the deed were inadmissible as self-serving in an action to establish a trust in the property conveyed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by George Kershaw against Martin Madsen, to establish a trust and compel a conveyance. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Everts, Ewing & Wild, J. R. Fitch, O. O. Collins, and Collins & Collins, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Lindsay & Conley, of Fresno, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in the defendant's favor in an action instituted by said plaintiff to have it adjudged that a certain deed executed and delivered by one Anna Gothea Nielsen to the defendant Martin Madsen on July 3, 1907, was given without consideration and in trust for certain purposes, and while a confidential relationship existed between the parties to such conveyance, from which facts an implied trust is alleged to have arisen which the plaintiff seeks to have enforced by the court in decreeing a conveyance of the premises described in said deed from the defendant to the plaintiff as the sole heir of the grantor in said deed. There are certain admitted facts shown in the record which may be recited in order to clarify the matters in dispute between the parties to this appeal.

In the year 1891 Hans Nielsen, the father of Anna Gothea Nielsen, being about to die, made a will devising to his said daughter, then a child of three years of age, his whole estate, consisting of 40 acres of land in the county of Fresno, together with certain personal property of the value of about $3,000. By the terms of said will he nominated his friend Martin Madsen to be the executor thereof and the guardian of his said child. Upon his death the defendant qualified as such executor and guardian, and proceeded to administer the estate, both as such executor and guardian, until the year 1906, when, his ward, Anna, becoming of age, he rendered his final accounts, which being settled decrees of distribution and of his discharge as such guardian were duly made, and the property, both real and personal, was delivered over to his former ward. In the meantime his said ward, shortly after her father's death, had been taken to Copenhagen, Denmark, where she lived with her grandmother until she was of the age of 16 years, when she returned to California and became an inmate of the home of her said guardian, being treated by himself and his wife as one of their own children. In the year 1907 Anna Gothea Nielsen, being then 19 years of age, and wishing to return to Copenhagen upon a visit to her friends and relatives there, sought to sell and dispose of the 40-acre piece of land which she had inherited from her father, and of which for a year or so she had been in possession under said decree of distribution, in order to cover the expenses of her projected visit. She inquired of a real estate agent as to its value, and consulted with Martin Madsen and his wife as to its sale. The agent informed her that it was of the value of between $4,000 and $5,000. The result of these conferences was a conveyance of the land by her to Madsen by a deed absolute in form, the said conveyance being drawn by F. E. Cook, Esq., an attorney of Fresno, at her request, and being executed in his presence. The consideration expressed in said deed was $10, but the defendant testified that the actual consideration therefor was $4,500, which was paid by him partly at that time and by later remittances. The grantor in said deed shortly thereafter took her departure to Europe, remaining there about three years, when she again returned to California, and a year later, or in 1911, was married to George Kershaw, the plaintiff herein, going to live with him in Oakland temporarily, but in December, 1912, returning to the household of the defendant Madsen, where she remained as a member thereof until the year 1918, during much of which time her husband, the plaintiff herein, also lived with her in said household. In the latter year she went to live with her husband in an apartment in the city of Fresno, where in the year 1920 she died intestate, leaving her husband, the plaintiff herein, as her sole heir. During her lifetime, subsequent to the date of said conveyance, the said Anna Gothea Nielsen instituted no proceeding to set aside the same, and is not shown to have claimed or asserted to the defendant that he held the title to said premises in trust for her benefit, but it is claimed by the plaintiff herein that upon several occasions after the making of said deed she had asserted to the plaintiff and to others that the deed in question was a trust deed, made for the purpose of enabling the defendant to manage the premises described therein as her trustee and for her benefit, which testimony of the plaintiff the trial court, however, declined to admit in evidence upon the trial of the cause. The trial court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law wherein it found that the averments of the plaintiff's complaint, to the effect that, at the time of the execution of said deed, and for a long time prior thereto the said defendant had exercised parental authority or control over the said Anna Gothea Nielsen, or that she was under the control of said defendant in business matters, was untrue and that it was also untrue that the said defendant had proposed to the said Anna Gothea Nielsen that she should convey said property to him so that he could manage it or carry on her business affairs for her benefit. The court further found:

> "That on the 3d day of July, 1907, for a valuable consideration passing from said defendant Martin Madsen to said Anna Gothea Nielsen, the said Anna Gothea Nielsen, freely, and of her own volition, and not acting under duress, menace, fraud, or undue influence, or any influence of any kind, character, or description, either exercised by the defendant Martin Madsen, or by any other person or persons whatever, made, executed, and delivered the said deed and instrument in writing, which said deed is accurately described and set out in full in plaintiff's complaint, to the defendant Martin Madsen, and that thereupon the defendant Martin Madsen became, ever since has been, and now is the owner of the said real property described in said deed, in fee simple absolute."

The court further found that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. Judgment was accordingly entered in the defendant's favor, and it is from said judgment that this appeal has been taken.

[1] The first contention which the plaintiff makes upon this appeal is that the trial court was in error in excluding from the evidence herein the declarations of the grantor in said deed made to her husband and to other persons as to the purpose and effect of said deed, and as to her intention in the execution and delivery of the same to the defendant. As to the declarations which the plaintiff asserted that his deceased wife had made to him during the existence of their marriage relation touching the subject of her understanding and intent in the making and delivery of said deed, it would seem to be a sufficient answer to the plaintiff's offer of these declarations in evidence to refer to that portion of subdivision 1 of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure which reads as follows:

> "A husband cannot be examined for or against his wife without her consent; nor a wife for or against her husband, without his consent; nor can either, during the marriage or afterward, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage."

The authorities fully uphold the respondent's objection to this class of evidence under the foregoing provision of the Code. Humphrey v. Pope, 1 Cal. App. 374, 82 Pac. 223; Falk v. Wittram, 120 Cal. 479, 52 Pac. 707, 65 Am. St. Rep. 184; Emmons v. Barton, 109 Cal. 662, 42 Pac. 303.

[2] As to the declarations of the grantor in said deed, claimed to have been made by Anna Gothea Nielsen to other persons than her husband or the defendant herein, and not in the latter's presence, it would seem equally clear that these self-serving declarations of the deceased grantor in said deed, made a considerable time after the execution and delivery thereof to the defendant, were inadmissible in evidence. The appellant in urging their admissibility relies upon the cases of Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 151 Pac. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703; Sprague v. Walton, 145 Cal. 228, 78 Pac. 645; Donahue v. Sweeney, 171 Cal. 391, 153 Pac. 708; Fisher v. Oliver, 174 Cal. 781, 164 Pac. 800; Rice v. Carey, 170 Cal. 753, 151 Pac. 135. In each of these cases, however, the question before the trial court related to the execution or nonexecution and delivery or nondelivery of the instrument in question, and the Supreme Court in each case, in deciding that the declarations, acts, and conduct of the grantor subsequent to the alleged execution or delivery of the document were admissible as bearing upon the intent of the grantor to execute or to deliver the instrument was careful to limit such evidence to these purposes, and to declare that the rule thus laid down was not in conflict with the general rule otherwise reaffirmed that the declarations, acts, and conduct of a grantor, made after he has parted with his title and in disparagement of it, are inadmissible. This is particularly emphasized in Fisher v. Oliver, supra, in which the earlier cases are reviewed, and the case of Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186, which lays down the general doctrine is expressly affirmed. Other cases reaffirming the doctrine declared in Bury v. Young are Ord v. Ord, 99 Cal. 523, 34 Pac. 83; Hyde v. Buckner, 108 Cal. 522, 41 Pac. 416; Emmons v. Barton, supra; Smith v. Mason, 122 Cal. 426, 55 Pac. 143; Bollinger v. Bollinger, 154 Cal. 695, 99 Pac. 196. We conclude that the trial court was not in error in refusing to admit in evidence the declarations of the grantor of this conveyance after the date of its admitted execution and delivery to the defendant herein in disparagement of the title therein conveyed by her.

The appellant's next and final contention is that the evidence in the case is insufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court that it was not true that during the period immediately preceding or attending the making and delivery of the deed in question the defendant exercised parental authority and control of Anna Gothea Nielson, or that she was then under the control of said defendant in business matters, and also the further finding of the trial court that the said conveyance from Anna Gothea Nielsen to the defendant made on July 3, 1907, was for a valuable consideration, and was made, executed, and delivered by her freely and of her own volition, and not acting under duress, menace, fraud, or undue influence, and that the defendant thereby became the owner of the property therein conveyed in fee simple absolute. We have carefully examined the entire evidence in the case bearing upon these contentions, and, while it is true, as shown by the practically uncontradicted evidence of all of the parties concerned, that there existed between the defendant and Anna Gothea Nielsen, at all times from her early childhood and up to the time of her death, a most cordial and affectionate relation approaching the relation of parent and child, and that said relation was at times, and especially during the period of the defendant's service as executor of her father's estate and as guardian of her person and estate, confidential in the highest degree, there is no sufficient evidence that this relation was taken advantage of by the defendant, or that the feelings of trust and confidence and deserved affection uniformly held by the said Anna Gothea Nielsen toward the defendant during all her life were violated by him in this or any other transaction between them. As to the particular transaction under review upon this appeal, there is sufficient evidence to fully sustain the latter finding of the trial court above referred to as to the adequacy of the consideration for said conveyance, as to its payment and as to the freedom of the transaction from any unfairness or undue influence practiced by the defendant or any member of his household upon the said Anna Gothea Nielsen, and affecting the making, execution and delivery of her said deed. The trial court committed no error or abuse of discretion in resolving whatever conflicts there were in the evidence touching this subject in the defendant's favor. The evidence sustains the findings. The findings support the judgment, and the judgment therefore should be, and is hereby, affirmed.

1. Criminal law 🔑507(7)—Denial of instruction on law of accomplice testimony in prosecution for pandering held not error.

In a prosecution for pandering where conviction was sought to be sustained on testimony of the woman influenced, held, that it was not error to deny a charge on the law of accomplice testimony, since such woman could not have been an accomplice in the crime of inducing and persuading herself to become an inmate of a house of prostitution.

2. Prostitution 🔑4—Officers' testimony held to establish defendant's place house of prostitution.

In prosecution for pandering, testimony of police officers held sufficient to establish the house under defendant's control a house of prostitution, nor did the fact that such officers' knowledge was obtained in course of official duties rather than by general inquiry render it inadmissible.

3. Criminal law 🔑539(1)—Court's discretion in permitting reading in evidence of absent witnesses' testimony held not abused.

In prosecution for pandering, evidence held insufficient to show an abuse of discretion by the court in determining that due diligence has been used in searching for a witness, so as to warrant the reading in evidence of her testimony taken before a committing magistrate as allowed by Pen. Code, § 686.

4. Criminal law 🔑736(1)—Whether diligence exercised to find witness within state question of fact for trial judge.

Whether due diligence has been had in efforts to find witness within state is question of fact for trial court, whose determination will not be interfered with except where discretion abused.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Mason Brown was convicted of pandering, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Stanley A. Visel and W. W. Judd, both of Los Angeles, and C. L. Bogue, of San Pedro, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Lorrin Andrews, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The information in this action was in four counts, each charging a separate crime. The defendant was found guilty on the first count alone, wherein he was accused of the crime of pandering in that on or about the 19th day of May, 1922, he did willfully and feloniously procure a female, a certain Mrs. Lundy, and feloniously did induce, persuade, and encourage said Mrs. Lundy to become an inmate of a house of prostitution. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The evidence relied upon by the prosecution consisted principally of the testimony of Mrs. Lundy and of several police officers. The errors claimed and relied upon by appellant are as follows:

(1) That the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury, as requested by the defendant, concerning the manner in which the testimony of an accomplice is to be regarded, and concerning the corroboration required in order to authorize a conviction based upon the testimony of an accomplice.

(2) That if the jury found as a matter of fact that Mrs. Lundy was an accomplice, her testimony was not sufficiently corroborated.

(3) That the proof that the hotel where, according to the testimony, the offense was committed, was a house of ill fame or prostitution, was not sufficient as a matter of law.

(4) That the court erred in permitting the deposition of Mrs. Lundy to be received in evidence over the objection of the appellant that no proper foundation had been laid.

(5) That the court refused to give a number of proper instructions offered by the defense. (This fifth point will be passed without discussion, because not supported by argument in the brief for appellant.)

The crime of pandering, as defined in the statute, may be committed in several ways. It includes the case where any person shall "induce, persuade or encourage a female person to become an inmate of a house of prostitution, or shall procure for a female person a place as inmate in a house of prostitution, or as an inmate of any place in which prostitution is encouraged or allowed." Stats. 1911, p. 9; Deering's Gen. Laws (1915 Ed.) Act 865.

> "A conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof. An accomplice is hereby defined as one who is liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against the defendant on trial in the cause in which the testimony of the accomplice is given." Pen. Code, § 1111.

The last sentence of this section of the Code was added thereto by amendment in the year 1915 (Laws 1915, p. 760).

In support of his contention that Mrs. Lundy by her testimony placed herself in the position of an accomplice to the alleged crime, appellant sets out in his brief that part of her testimony which he deems pertinent to the question. The evidence shows that the house known as the Rex Hotel, at San Pedro, was under the personal management and conduct of the defendant. Mrs. Lundy testified that on the night of May 17, 1922, she went to this house, where she remained for about three days; that she had arrived in town that day and went to this hotel because she could not get any other room in the town; that she did not go there for the purpose of prostitution. Questioned as to the reason why she thereafter conducted herself as stated in the testimony she said:

> "Well, Mr. Brown's proposition to me that there was good money in the house, and I was not planning on staying here very long, and I just figured that I could get a few new clothes while I was there."

She gave further testimony which, if true, shows that pursuant to the suggestions of defendant, she engaged in the business of prostitution and received the visits of several men who were sent to her room by the defendant. But on the third night of her stay there the supposed customer proved to be a police officer, who was assisted by two other officers who previously had hidden themselves in the room. After he had paid her, and she had accepted, marked money for the stated purpose, Mrs. Lundy was arrested; whereby that episode was closed.

[1] Viewed simply upon the facts, and the nature of the transaction described, it at first seems plain enough that Mrs. Lundy could not be an accomplice in the crime of pandering in a case where the pandering as charged consisted of the inducing, persuading, and encouraging of herself to become an inmate of a house of prostitution. To understand the argument for appellant one must consider the definition of an "accomplice" according to section 1111, together with section 31 of the Penal Code, which states what persons are principals in the commission of a crime. If there appears, among other things, that all persons concerned in the commission of a crime, whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid and abet in its commission, are principals. So it is argued that, according to the testimony of Mrs. Lundy, she was not a victim, but voluntarily co-operated with the defendant in the very act of inducing or encouraging herself to be and remain in the house for the stated purpose; that thereby she aided and abetted the defendant in his reciprocal act of inducing or encouraging her in the described conduct.

The leading case relied upon by appellant is People v. Coffey, 161 Cal. 446, 119 Pac. 901, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 704. That was a case wherein the defendant was charged with the reception of a bribe, and it was contended that his conviction was obtained in violation of law upon the uncorroborated testimony of a self-confessed accomplice in the asserted crime. The judgment was reversed on the ground that the testimony of that person was not corroborated as required by law. The person so considered as an accomplice was one who, according to his testimony, had acted as an intermediary between the giver and the receiver of the bribe. The Supreme Court held that the lower court erred when it instructed the jury that upon the question whether one is an accomplice in the commission of a crime "the final test of the question as applied to a witness in any case is, could such witness lawfully be indicted with the defendant for the offense on trial? If so, he is an accomplice within the meaning of the law. If not, he is not, and the man who gives or offers a bribe is not for that reason an accomplice of the one who receives or agrees to receive a bribe." It is significant that the decision in People v. Coffey, supra, was soon followed by the amendment of section 1111 of the Penal Code, which amendment we have quoted. Manifestly, it was by that amendment, intended to place it beyond doubt that the rule requiring corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice as specified in that section is limited to cases where there is evidence which, if true, classifies the witness as one "liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against the defendant on trial."

The offense charged against appellant Brown is one which could be committed by one person, without participation of another person in the act by which the crime was perpetrated. In this it differs from bribery, prostitution, and various other crimes. It involves an absurdity, contrary to good sense to say that, under the evidence in this case, Mrs. Lundy "induced, persuaded and encouraged" Mrs. Lundy to become an inmate of defendant's house, and thereby could have been held guilty of pandering, because she cooperated with the defendant when he "induced, persuaded and encouraged" her to become such inmate. In our opinion the court did not err in refusing to give the requested instructions relating to the corroboration required, of the testimony of an accomplice.

[2] The evidence that the Rex Hotel, while under the management and control of the defendant, was a house of prostitution, is sufficient. Several witnesses testified that they knew the reputation of the house and that it was reputed to be a house of that character. People v. De Martini, 25 Cal. App. 9, 142 Pac. 898. The fact that these witnesses were police officers and that their knowledge of the reputation of the house had been obtained by them in the course of their official duties—including conversations with several persons—rather than by more general inquiry, did not make their testimony inadmissible.

[3] The testimony of Mrs. Lundy, taken before the committing magistrate, was read in evidence, as permitted by section 686 of the Penal Code, after preliminary evidence had been received which the court held to be sufficient to establish the fact that the said Mrs. Lundy could not with due diligence be found within this state. It was shown by the testimony of Mrs. Spinner that in June, 1922, Mrs. Lundy resided for a short time at the house of Mrs. Spinner, and then went to San Francisco. From a stated address at that city on the 19th of June, she wrote a letter to Mrs. Spinner. In this case a subpœna was sent to the sheriff at San Francisco, who made return that Mrs. Lundy had left said address "five months ago without paying her rent. Very bad tenant, always in trouble. Her husband is a marine in the navy, now at Mare Island, Vallejo, California." Various other efforts were made to find the witness, but without success.

[4] Under all the facts proved concerning Mrs. Lundy, we cannot say that the court abused its discretion in determining that due diligence had been used in searching for her, notwithstanding that there is no evidence that any inquiry was directed to her husband for the purpose of finding her. The ordinary presumption that a husband will know where his wife is living had become very unsubstantial in this instance. The question as to whether it is satisfactorily shown that a witness cannot with due diligence be found within the state is a question of fact that is addressed to the trial court, to be determined by it from evidence introduced before it, "and with the determination of that question of fact by the trial court, this court will not interfere, unless the evidence thereof is such as to satisfy the court that the trial court abused the discretion confided to it in holding that due diligence had been used, and that the witness could not be found." People v. Lewandowski, 143 Cal. 574, 77 Pac. 467; People v. Trent, 25 Cal. App. 740, 145 Pac. 541.

Finally, we are compelled to say that our examination of the entire record in this case satisfies us that the verdict is well sustained by the evidence and that in the conviction of the defendant there has been no miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

JACKSON v. SNOW et al. (Civ. 4491.)

1. Appeal and error ⟹883—Objection to introduction of oral testimony concerning written contract held not available after counsel had agreed to its introduction.

Where at the opening of trial counsel have agreed that oral testimony might be received for the purpose of explaining an apparent ambiguity in a written contract, and where testimony has been received without objection, the objection cannot thereafter be made to the introduction of further oral testimony nor prejudice predicated on the overruling of such objection.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⟹62—Clauses of contract for conveying realty relating to restrictions, reservations, easements, and incumbrances held not repugnant to each other; "incumbrances."

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1641, 1645, 1649, and 1651, a provision of a contract for the conveyance of realty "subject to conditions, restrictions, reservations and easements now of record," held not repugnant to a subsequent clause stating that the property was "free and clear from all incumbrances whatsoever, except as otherwise herein expressly provided for, to wit, 1921–22 taxes," the term "incumbrances" as used by laymen relating to something that is a lien upon the property which requires the payment of money to discharge, and not generally referring to a restriction, reservation, right of way, or other easement.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Incumbrance (on title).]

3. Specific performance ⚷126(2)—Objection to judgment as requiring assumption of mortgage by purchaser of realty held without merit.

Objection to a judgment requiring specific performance of a contract to purchase realty, on the ground that it required defendant to assume a mortgage on the property, held without merit where the contract itself provided that the property was to be conveyed free and clear from all incumbrances whatsoever, except certain taxes and restrictions and reservations then of record.

4. New trial ⚷140(1)—Affidavits in support of motion for new trial held to disclose bad faith and warrant denial.

Affidavits filed in support of a motion for a new trial, after judgment requiring specific performance by the purchaser of a contract to convey realty, held to plainly establish bad faith and warrant denial of such motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by D. Ripley Jackson against Pearl E. Snow and the Title Insurance & Trust Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank Bryant, of Los Angeles, for appellant Snow.

Chas. H. Brock, J. N. Hastings, and Earl E. Johnson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant Title Insurance & Trust Co.

I. Henry Harris, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to enforce specific performance of the sale of real property. The plaintiff alleged that on the 13th day of September, 1921, plaintiff and the defendant Snow entered into a written contract, which is attached as an exhibit to the complaint and is designated as a "sales deposit receipt." This receipt recited that plaintiff's agents had received from the defendant Snow the sum of $1,650 as a deposit and part payment on the purchase price of the real property "subject to conditions, restrictions, reservations, and easements now of record." The contract recited that the full purchase price was $11,000, $5,500, including the amount therein receipted for, being payable upon the execution and delivery of deed, together with a guaranteed certificate of title showing title to said property to be in said owner "free and clear of all incumbrances whatsoever, except as otherwise herein expressly provided for, to wit. 1921–1922 taxes." The complaint further alleged that the plaintiff had performed all the terms required of him under the contract, but that the defendant had refused to accept the property, and had repudiated the contract. It was also alleged that the property included in the contract was worth the sum of $11,000, and not less, and that the transfer of said property was an adequate consideration for the payment of the moneys agreed to be paid by the purchaser; that the contract as to the defendant Snow was in all respects just and reasonable, and was not obtained by any misrepresentation, concealment or unfair practices; and that the assent of neither party was obtained under influence of mistake, misapprehension, or surprise. The prayer called for a decree compelling the defendant Snow to carry out the terms of the contract and compelling the defendant Title Insurance & Trust Company to pay over to the plaintiff the sum of $1,650, which had been deposited with it in escrow as part of the first payment under the contract. Each defendant filed a separate answer. That of the defendant Snow admitted all the material allegations of plaintiff's complaint excepting those relating to plaintiffs being ready and able to transfer said property free from defect in title, or that plaintiff otherwise performed or substantially fulfilled the terms of his contract. By way of separate defense it was alleged that certain restrictions, conditions, and reservations stood of record against said property contained in the deeds of conveyance through which the plaintiff deraigned title as follows: A restriction prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor upon the property, one prohibiting the erection of a building within less than 30 feet from the front line thereof, and one prohibiting the erection of a building thereon less than $1,000 in value except on the rear of the lot. By way of cross-complaint the same defendant set forth these restrictions as constituting a material defect against the title to the property, and alleged that without said restrictions said property would be reasonably worth the sum of $16,000; that the purchase price thereof fixed in said contract was $11,000; and that by reason of plaintiff's failure to convey the property free from such restrictions said defendant had been damaged in the sum of $5,000. A demurrer to this cross-complaint was sustained and the amended answer of the defendant Snow was filed, omitting all reference to the cross-complaint and claim for damages and praying merely for the return of the sum of $1,650 which had been deposited in escrow as part of the first payment. At the same time an amended cross-complaint was filed which contained the same allegations relating to the value of the property which appeared in the original answer and cross-complaint and prayed for damages in the sum of $5,000 in addition to the return of the original deposit.

The case was tried upon these pleadings, and findings were made that by virtue of the contract of the parties it was understood and agreed that the defendant Snow purchased said property subject to the condition, restrictions, and easements then of record, and subject to 1921–1922 taxes; that the plaintiff was always ready, willing, and able to perform his part of the contract, but that the defendant had violated her contract and declined and refused to accept the property subject to the conditions and restrictions of record as agreed in said contract; that the allegations of the cross-complaint were not true; and that there were no defects in the title of said property other than such defects as the defendant Snow agreed to accept. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, commanding the defendant Snow to perform the terms of her contract, and commanding the defendant Title Insurance & Trust Company to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $1,650 less any sum due it from the plaintiff under the escrow agreement. Both defendants have appealed from the judgment.

The appeal of the appellant Title Insurance & Trust Company does not require separate consideration. Its appeal was taken under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure and is presented to this court with nothing more than a recital of the findings of fact and conclusions of law made by the trial court and a statement by the appellant that it has no interest in the litigation other than as an escrow agent and in maintaining the status quo of the escrow until a final judgment is obtained defining the rights of the respective parties. It could have reached this same result by depositing the money in court at the time of the trial of the action, and thus saved the parties some unnecessary expense.

The appeal of the appellant Snow presents three grounds for consideration: (1) That the admission of oral testimony to explain the written contract was error; (2) that the judgment entered was for an excessive amount in that there was an outstanding mortgage upon the property for $2,500 which this appellant will be required to assume in addition to the payment of $11,000 which was the agreed price for the property; (3) that this appellant was entitled to a new trial on the showing made on the hearing of her motion in the trial court.

[1] 1. Upon the first point the argument is that, where part of a contract is written and part printed and the written and printed parts are inconsistent, the words in writing will control the construction, and oral evidence to explain the intention of the parties is not admissible. At the opening of the trial, counsel for respondent made an oral statement of the case in which it was said that the only issue before the court was whether the language of the written contract, "showing title to said property to be in the said owner free and clear of all incumbrances whatsoever, except as otherwise herein expressly provided for, to wit, 1921–1922 taxes" ("1921–1922 taxes" of the portion quoted being written in the contract and the remainder thereof being printed), controlled the other printed portion of the contract which read "subject to conditions, restrictions, reservations and easements now of record." As to what then occurred, we quote from the reporter's transcript:

> "The Court: Well, that is an ambiguity that will call for oral testimony to explain. Mr. Harris: Yes, sir. The Court: You concur, gentlemen for the defense, in that statement as being substantially the issue involved? Mr. Landreth: I am representing the real defendant [Snow], and that is substantially the case, the ambiguity which will be explained by oral testimony, or, after the actual receipt is before the court, by the examination of the actual written instrument and the rules of construction."

Thereafter respondent produced a witness who testified that before the property was offered for sale the auctioneer announced in the presence of all the prospective bidders that the property would be sold subject to the restrictions and reservations of record and the taxes for 1921–1922. This testimony was all received without objection. Other witnesses were called and testified to the same effect, and then for the first time counsel for appellant interposed the objection that the written contract embodied all the terms of the agreement and that the oral testimony was improper. Having agreed at the opening of the trial that oral testimony might be received for that purpose, and having permitted the testimony of the witness O'Connor to be given without objection, this appellant cannot claim prejudice in the overruling of his objection to the introduction of the testimony of other witnesses which was merely cumulative.

[2] We find no error in the trial court's construction of the contract. The language "subject to conditions, restrictions, reservations, and easements now of record" is in no wise repugnant to the language "free and clear of all incumbrances whatsoever except as otherwise herein expressly provided for, to wit, 1921–1922 taxes." Though it is true that, in the legal sense, restrictions, reservations, and easements are treated as incumbrances upon realty, it is likewise true that such is not the common or ordinary use of the term by the layman. The common use of the term "incumbrances" by the layman relates to something that is a lien upon the property which requires the payment of money to discharge. It is scarcely, if ever, used in reference to a restriction, reservation, right of way, or other easement. It is a cardinal rule of construction of all contracts that the court should ascertain the intention of the parties where this is possible. For this purpose the whole contract is taken together so as to give effect to every part (section 1641, Civ. Code), and technical words are to be interpreted as usually understood by persons in the profession or business to which they relate, unless clearly used in a different sense. Section 1645, Civ. Code. If the terms of a promise are in any respect ambiguous or uncertain, then the contract must be interpreted in the sense in which the promisor believed, at the time of making it, that the promisee understood it. Section 1649, Civ. Code. It is only in a case where the written portion of a contract is "absolutely repugnant" to the printed portion that the latter must be disregarded. Section 1651, Civ. Code.

All the evidence received in this case shows beyond a doubt that when the contract was executed the parties intended that the sale was made subject to all conditions, restrictions, reservations, and easements then of record. The contract was executed in the office of this appellant's husband, who was then employed in the trust department of the Title Company and was a man experienced in the examination and preparation of contracts of this nature. According to his own testimony, he conceived the idea that the writing "1921–1922 taxes" would support the contention that the printed portion of the contract relating to restrictions, reservations, and easements might be disregarded. He so advised his wife, and, acting upon his advice, she repudiated the contract, though at the time of the trial she failed to appear, and offered no evidence to aid the court in arriving at the intention of the parties at the time of the execution of the contract. In accordance with the sections of the Code above cited the trial court properly construed the contract to mean that the property was taken subject to the conditions, restrictions, reservations, and easements then of record, and that such was the intention of the parties at the time of its execution.

[3] 2. The second point raised by this appellant is wholly without merit. In the first place, there is no evidence in the record that a mortgage of $2,500, or in any other sum, was outstanding at the time of the trial; but if such be the case, this appellant is fully protected by the judgment, which provides that the payments required of this appellant are to be made only upon the tender to her by the respondent of a guaranteed certificate of title showing title to said property to be in respondent free and clear of all incumbrances whatsoever except 1921–1922 taxes, and conditions, restrictions, reservations, and easements then of record. This plainly requires the respondent to clear the title of any mortgages outstanding against the property.

[4] 3. The affidavits filed by this appellant on her motion for a new trial disclose a state of facts which plainly indicates that her entire action in this proceeding was taken in bad faith. Her own affidavit alleged that she was sick at the time of the trial and was unable to be present in court, but it appears from the record that no request for a continuance of the trial had been made. She also alleged that she was present at all times and within reasonable distance from the auctioneer and heard his statements, but that at no time did the auctioneer state or announce that the property would be taken subject to any conditions, restrictions, reservations, or easements whatsoever. This, of course, was merely contradictory of the testimony of the four witnesses who testified at the request of the respondent that such announcement had been made by the auctioneer. The other affidavits presented upon this motion merely set before the court matters of questionable legal advice which had been given to the appellant. She was, however, represented in court on the day of the trial by her counsel who was not prevented from protecting her interests, and it does not appear that she was in any way prejudiced by any advice which she had received from others. In her cross-complaint she alleged that the restrictions relating to the use and occupation of the property materially affected the value thereof, that without said restrictions such property would be reasonably worth the sum of $16,000, while with said restrictions it was not reasonably worth more than $11,000. Upon this allegation she prayed for damages in the sum of $5,000 for the failure of respondent to convey the property to her without said restrictions. This in itself was sufficient to satisfy the trial court that this appellant was not defending the action in good faith; that her claim relating to the construction of the contract was purely technical, because, if the property was worth $11,000 with the restrictions, she was getting just what she bargained for, whereas if she had knowledge of the restrictions and executed the contract with the intention that the respondent should be required to remove them, she was taking an undue and unfair advantage of the respondent, because she must have known either that they could not be removed or that, if removed, the value of the property would be enhanced to her profit to the extent of $5,000. All these circumstances so plainly disclosed the bad faith on the part of this appellant that the trial court was fully justified in denying her motion for a new trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

ROCKRIDGE PLACE CO. v. CITY OF OAKLAND. (Civ. 4465.)

1. Eminent domain 🔑280—Property owner by petitioning for grading of street does not thereby waive or estop himself from asserting right to damages.

A property owner, by joining in a written petition to a city council requesting it to grade a public street abutting on his property to the official grade, does not thereby waive his rights or estop himself from asserting his rights to demand compensation for the damages caused by such grading.

2. Eminent domain 🔑266—Failure of property owner to pursue particular remedy for injuries from grading of street does not preclude pursuit of other remedy.

A property owner suffering damages by reason of the grading of a street has a right either to enjoin or to sue for damages, and his failure to avail himself of one of these rights has no effect upon his pursuit of the other.

3. Eminent domain 🔑280—Does not exist where property owner seeks enforcement of constitutional right to recover damages to property.

Estoppel does not exist where a property owner seeks enforcement of his constitutional right to recover damages to his property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Action by the Rockridge Place Company against the City of Oakland. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leon E. Gray, City Atty., and Markell C. Baer, Deputy City Atty., both of Oakland, for appellant.

F. E. Boland, C. Irving Wright, and John Douglas Short, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. In 1913 the city council of Oakland changed and re-established the official grade and width of the sidewalks on Broadway under the Change of Grade Act of 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 1018). The council, pursuant to proper legal proceedings, officially changed and re-established the grade to a depth of nearly 30 feet lower than it had formerly been opposite the plaintiff's property at the crest of the Broadway hill. On June 13, 1914, the plaintiff, along with a majority of other owners of property fronting on Broadway street, between Ocean View drive on the south and Temescal creek on the north, signed and presented a petition to the council requesting the improvement of Broadway by grading it to the official grade, preparatory to later curbing and guttering the street and paving it with oil macadam and constructing a culvert in Temescal creek. Following the filing of this petition and on November 30, 1914, the city of Oakland adopted an ordinance lowering further the grade on Broadway and naming a street called Patton street and establishing grades on Patton street. Thereafter, the city council, in accordance with the Improvement Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730), adopted the plans of the city engineer, passed its resolution of intention to grade Broadway, from Ocean View drive to Patton street, which lies close by Temescal creek. Said resolution was published and posted in the manner provided by law. No protests were filed. On January 11, 1915, the city council passed its resolution ordering the work. The notice of award was published, but again no protests. The contractors entered upon their work and lowered the grade of Broadway and paved the street to conform to the official grade. During this time the plaintiff, the court found, was cognizant of the performance of the work but at no time acquiesced in or consented to the doing thereof. The facts above set forth are taken from the findings of the trial court. No contention is made that the proceedings before the city council looking to the change of grade in Broadway had not in all respects been properly complied with. The prayer of plaintiff's complaint was for damages generally caused by the depreciation in value of the abutting property and the interference with its use and the ingress from and egress into Broadway. For such depreciation in value plaintiff was awarded the sum of $750. The appeal is upon the judgment roll.

[1] The appeal is concerned with the consequential damages claimed to have been caused the property by the physical or actual change of the grade, and the widening of the road to the outer edges of the sidewalk, which improvements were made in 1914. The question presented is, as stated by counsel for defendant: "Is a property owner who joins in a written petition to the city council requesting it to grade a public street abutting on his property to the official grade, entitled to demand compensation for the damages caused by such grading?" or, as stated by counsel for plaintiff: "Whether the plaintiff waived its rights, or is estopped to assert them, by signing the petition above mentioned."

Counsel for defendant says that "the problem of law involved has never been squarely decided in California," and that "defendant relies upon the doctrine of waiver rather than a strict estoppel." We have been unable to find a case in this state which can be said to be "upon all fours" with the one before us, but somewhat similar questions have been presented to and passed upon by our Supreme Court. The fundamental principle involved is to be found in the organic law of the state which prescribes as a paramount rule that—

"Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made to, or paid into court for, the owner." Const. Cal. art. 1, § 14; Reardon v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. 492, 6 Pac. 317, 56 Am. Rep. 109; Eachus v. Los Angeles Railway Co., 103 Cal. 614, 37 Pac. 750, 42 Am. St. Rep. 149; Eachus v. City of Los Angeles, 130 Cal. 492, 62 Pac. 829, 80 Am. St. Rep. 147; Partridge v. City of Richmond, 36 Cal. App. 389, 172 Pac. 166.

The change of grade from which damage resulted was accomplished under the provisions of the Improvement Act of 1911. The act nowhere requires the filing of a petition signed by property owners to set in motion the provisions thereof relative to street grading. Under what circumstances, or in what form, the petition was presented, the record does not disclose. The municipality was petitioned to exercise its undoubted right to grade the street, and the petition must be taken as a request for the making of that improvement with due regard to the rights of the property owners. Assuming that the petition was the moving cause of the doing of the work, it was the duty of the municipality to proceed in accordance with the law. We fail to see how any greater effect than this could be given to the petition.

There are a number of decisions in other jurisdictions which are directly in point, and while there is a conflict of authority we are of the opinion that the better view is expressed in those cases which hold that where the right of an abutting owner to be compensated for damage to his property by a change in the grade of the street is rested upon constitutional guaranties, such waiver of a constitutional right ought not to be lightly inferred, and cannot clearly be derived from the request to grade the street. New Decatur v. Scharfenberg, 147 Ala. 367, 371, 41 South. 1025, 119 Am. St. Rep. 81.

In Barker v. Taunton, 119 Mass. 392, the court said:

> "It is no bar to the claim for damages made by the petitioner, that he was one of the original petitioners for the improvements. That alone is not evidence of an assent that his property shall be taken for public use without compensation."

And the Pennsylvania court said in Jones v. Bangor, 144 Pa. 638, at page 648, 23 Atl. 252, at page 253:

> "We cannot assent to the proposition that a lot owner, who joins in a request to the borough authorities to grade a street, is estopped thereby from claiming compensation for an injury to his property by the grading."

And as was said in the case of Robinson v. City of Vicksburg, 99 Miss. 439, 54 South. 858:

> "Or may a waiver be implied by his signing a petition with the knowledge that in paving the street the city might find it necessary to change its grade? We think not. In our judgment such conduct ought not to operate as an estoppel. A constitutional right may not be so lightly waived. There is nothing whatever in the petition, nor in the conduct of the appellant, as disclosed by the record, which evidenced a purpose on his part to waive his constitutional right to claim damages to his property, caused by raising the grade of the street."

Defendant further contends that under the authority of Butters v. City of Oakland, 53 Cal. App. 294, 299, 200 Pac. 354, 356, decided by this court June 22, 1921, the plaintiff should have first brought action to enjoin the performance of the work until its damages were in a proper proceeding, determined and paid, speciously selecting and quoting from the opinion of the Supreme Court in bank denying hearing the following:

> "* * * The remedy of the property owners in such a case (referring to the acts of the city in changing the grade) is not to enjoin the collection of the assessment levied to pay the cost of the work, but to enjoin the performance of the contract prior to the work having been done until damages are paid, in case the result of such work would cause damage to the abutting property."

The remainder of the expression of the Supreme Court upon the subject reads:

> "It constitutes no defense against the collection of the assessment. That the city is liable for damages caused to the abutting property by excavation or fills in a street in front thereof, see Eachus v. Los Angeles, 130 Cal. 493; Eachus v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 103 Cal. 614; Reardon v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. 492, 506."

While the appeal in the Butters Case concerned the same property involved herein, it was directed toward certain defects in the proceedings incident to assessment, and had no reference whatever to the question presented in the instant case, which is wholly concerned with a claim for damages resulting from the grading work.

[2] A party has a right either to enjoin or to sue for damages in a case such as this, and his failure to avail himself of one of the rights has no effect upon his pursuit of the other. Wilcox v. Engebretsen, 160 Cal. 288, 116 Pac. 750.

[3] Counsel for defendant has said that he relies upon the doctrine of waiver rather than a strict estoppel. From this statement and the argument presented in the briefs in support thereof, we gather that it is the thought of defendant's counsel that waiver rests fundamentally upon the doctrine of estoppel; that the question as here presented rests upon the facts from which it is to be ascertained whether or not plaintiff is estopped to deny that it has waived its rights to damages. Knarston v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 140 Cal. 57, 73 Pac. 740. The trial court upon the facts has, we think, correctly concluded that plaintiff is not barred nor estopped from claiming damages. Furthermore, an estoppel does not exist where the property owner seeks enforcement of the constitutional right to recover damages to his property. Sala v. Pasadena, 162 Cal. 714, 124 Pac. 539; Partridge v. City of Richmond, 36 Cal. App. 389, 172 Pac. 166.

The judgment is affirmed.

WRIGHT v. CITY OF OAKLAND.
(Civ. 4465.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 27, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 25, 1923.)

Municipal corporations ⟹280(1) — Property owner by entering agreement with grading contractors to fill an adjacent lot held not to have lost right to damages resulting to her from such grading.

In an action by a property owner to recover damages to her property from the grading of a street, where it was shown that she had no knowledge of the commencement of the work, but after learning of it had entered into an agreement with the grading contractors to place some of the earth so removed on an adjacent lot belonging to her, and also to remove a certain bank of earth from her property, held, that by such agreement she had not waived her right to enjoin the contractors or the municipality from proceeding or completing the work or estop herself from asserting her right to damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Action by Edith F. Wright against the City of Oakland. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leon E. Gray, City Atty., and Markell C. Baer, Deputy City Atty., both of Oakland, for appellant.

F. E. Boland, C. Irving Wright and John Douglas Short, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. This case is almost identical with that of Rockridge Place Co. v. City of Oakland (Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 64 decided this day. The cases were tried together upon substantially the same facts, and both involve the same points of law.

The court gave plaintiff judgment against defendant in the sum of $2,000. As in the companion case the appeal comes up on the judgment roll alone.

In this case, however, the trial court found facts additional to those narrated in the Rockridge Place Co. Case. It found that plaintiff did not in fact know of the actual performance of the work until it was practically completed; that at the time plaintiff first saw the work there remained only a small portion of the grading and surfacing to be performed; that plaintiff did at no time acquiesce or consent to the doing of the work at all; that subsequent to this time plaintiff entered into a contract with the contractors who were engaged in lowering the grade adjacent to her property whereby the contractors agreed to place the earth so removed on an adjacent lot belonging to plaintiff, and also to remove a certain bank of earth from her property; that in consideration of this agreement plaintiff waived all right that she might have to enjoin either the said contractors or the city of Oakland from proceeding or completing the work; that in pursuance of said contract said earth, both that excavated from Broadway and that excavated from plaintiff's lot, was removed to the adjacent lot and there used to fill and raise its level; that said contract was entered into at the suggestion and for the convenience of the contractors, as well as for the convenience of plaintiff in leveling her adjacent property.

Defendant urges that the agreement between plaintiff and the contractors regarding the removal of the earth from her property shows acquiescence and is an additional reason why the doctrine of estoppel should apply against her. We think that these last-mentioned additional facts would seem rather to strengthen than to weaken plaintiff's case. A discussion of them would be mere reiteration.

Upon the authority of Rockridge Place Co. v. City of Oakland, this day decided, the judgment is affirmed.

STERNES et ux. v. SUTTER BUTTE CANAL CO. et al. (Civ. 2598.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 23, 1923. Rehearing Denied May 23, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 21, 1923.)

1. Eminent domain ⟹271—Remedy by way of recoupment in damages rather than by injunction may be had against public utility.

Remedy by way of recoupment in damages rather than by injunction may be had from a public utility for injuries sustained.

2. Waters and water courses ⟹156(2)—Contract to convey right of way for canal at "reasonable price" construed.

Where a contract with a canal company for the construction of a ditch provided "the necessary rights of way therefor through said lands will be granted without unnecessary delay to the first party at such reasonable price as may be acceptable, * * *" held, that the reasonable price referred to must be such as would reasonably compensate property owners for whatever pecuniary injury they suffered.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Reasonable Price.]

3. Eminent domain 🔑280—Grant of right of way of property owner estops subsequent action for damages.

A grant of a right of way by a landowner estops him from thereafter prosecuting any action for past, present, or future damages that may have occurred, or reasonably be expected to occur, by reason of the necessary, natural, or ordinary use of the utility for which the right of way is granted.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑156(2)—In determining reasonable price for grant of right of way for canal, grantors held entitled to same consideration as in condemnation proceedings.

Where a grant of a right of way to a canal company provided that the compensation should be such "reasonable price" as was acceptable to the grantee, held, that the grantors in an action to determine such reasonable price were entitled to present to the jury every item of damage or injury to their property for which they would have been entitled to recover in condemnation proceedings, including damages for seepage.

On Rehearing.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑158(2)—Agreement with canal company for construction of ditch held not to require adjoining landowners to furnish rights of way.

Agreements with a canal company for the construction of a ditch held not intend that the adjoining landowners should furnish the rights of way, but only that the cost of construction and right of ways should be borne by them in the first instance with an agreement for subsequent reimbursement by the canal company.

6. Eminent domain 🔑280—Contract for construction of ditch held not to contain waiver of rights to compensation for rights of way.

A waiver in an agreement with a canal company for the construction of a ditch of any right to claim a refund of money paid the canal company under the contract held not a waiver of right to compensation for the taking of rights of way.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Floyd G. Sternes and wife against the Sutter Butte Canal Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Arthur Coats, of Yuba City, for appellants.
W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, Henry Ingram, of Gridley, and A. H. Hewett, of Yuba City, for respondents.

PLUMMER, Justice pro tem. It appears from the complaint in this action that the appellants (husband and wife) are the owners of two tracts of land comprising about 200 acres situate in Sutter county, held and possessed by them as community property; that during the years 1919 and 1920 the respondent canal company entered upon both the said tracts of land and proceeded to excavate a canal, or ditch, of approximately 50 feet in width across parcel No. 1 of the tracts of land owned by the appellants, and constructed levees along the side lines of said ditch approximately 3 feet in height above the natural ground, leaving the bed of the canal about 2½ feet below the natural level of the surrounding country; that across parcel No. 2 the width of the canal was about 46 feet, with levees along the side lines, and the depth of the canal about the same as across parcel No. 1; that the lands belonging to the plaintiffs are adapted to the growing of grains, alfalfa, and practically all kinds of fruit trees; that the height of the water carried through the canal is above the level of the surrounding country; that during the irrigating season the water has seeped, and will continue to seep out of said canals, and flood, injure, and damage plaintiffs' land, and render it unfit for any use but the raising of rice; and that by reason of the construction of said canal the drainage of a considerable portion of the lands belonging to the plaintiffs is obstructed, and will continue to be obstructed, rendering the said lands unfit for farming purposes, all to the damage of plaintiffs in the total sum, including the land taken, of somewhat in excess of $31,000. A cross-complaint was filed by the canal company, based upon an indebtedness of the plaintiffs to the defendant company, but upon such issues there is no controversy, and consideration thereof need not be given.

The trial court confined the testimony to the value of the land taken, to wit, 5.18 acres, and excluded all testimony as to past, present, and prospective damages to the land not taken, and instructed the jury that only the value of the land actually taken could be considered, which value was fixed at the sum of $530. The correctness of this ruling is the issue tendered upon appeal.

[1] No deed to any right of way was executed by either of the plaintiffs to the defendant company, proceedings in eminent domain were not had, and this action is prosecuted as its antithesis, or opposite remedy, to which the plaintiffs are relegated where damages are sought from a public utility. The remedy of the plaintiffs by way of recoupment in damages, rather than by an injunction, is so well settled that citation of authorities is unnecessary.

It appears from the transcript that on or about the 15th day of September, 1919, the plaintiff Floyd G. Sternes and a number of other landowners entered into a contract, which contract contains the following reference to rights of way:

> "The cost of construction of said ditch, or ditches, and other necessary facilities, and the cost of necessary grants of rights of way therefor to the first party, shall be borne and paid by the second parties, each of the said second parties paying such pro rata of such costs as the area of his land set opposite his name bears to the total area of lands of all of the second parties; but said ditch or ditches, and facilities, and said rights of way shall be the property of the first party, and the second party shall be entitled to reimbursement of said costs from the first party without interest thereon, upon the conditions and to the extent hereinafter specified."

The manner of repayment was to be by way of giving credit by the canal company to the owner of the land from whom the right of way was received. The project not being carried forward as rapidly as had been anticipated, and also owing to increase in prices, costing more than had been anticipated, another agreement was entered into, dated the 30th day of August, 1920, between the canal company and certain landowners, including the appellant Floyd G. Sternes. In so far as this agreement relates to the right of way and compensation therefor, it reads as follows:

> "The second parties, severally agree that whenever any of the ditches shown on said map cross their lands * * * including the ditch or ditches constructed and to be constructed by the first party, the necessary rights of way therefor through said lands will be granted without unnecessary delay to the first party, at such reasonable price as may be acceptable to the first party; the amount of money payable therefor by the first party to each respective grantor, less whatever may be required to be paid to discharge encumbrances on the land to be granted, to be credited to the party making said grant as part of the cost to be borne and paid by said party for the construction of all of said ditches and other irrigating facilities as herein provided."

It was elsewhere provided in said contract that the landowners were to pay to the canal company the sum of $20 for each acre of land owned by them, and described and referred to in the aforementioned agreements. The wife of the plaintiff Floyd G. Sternes did not sign either of the agreements mentioned.

The appellants insist that under the provisions of section 172a of the Civil Code, as added by St. 1917, p. 829, § 2, the want of the wife's signature thereto renders the contracts just mentioned void. This being an action for damages for the taking of community property, and not an action to compel a conveyance, it would seem that whatever recovery is had would still be community property. However, by reason of the views hereinafter expressed, it seems unnecessary to determine such question, as the result arrived at would be identical with the conclusions which we have reached as to the right and amount of recovery. With this in view, let us consider the language of the contracts. The first makes no mention of the measure of compensation. The latter is as follows:

> "The necessary rights of way therefor through said lands will be granted without unnecessary delay to the first party, at such reasonable price as may be acceptable to the first party."

[2] It will be observed that this language refers to the compensation for the right of way, and is no different from the language ordinarily used, and which would ordinarily be used by any grantor in conveying a right of way for a specific purpose. There are no limiting clauses, and no words whatever which limit the reasonable price to be paid therefor to the land actually taken, even if the agreements to make this grant had been executed by both husband and wife. As before stated, no right of way was granted; entry was made and the land taken without payment. The reasonable price referred to in the contract must be held to be such as would reasonably compensate the appellants for whatever pecuniary injury they suffered, and whatever is included in a grant of a right of way is included within the terms of the contract executed by Floyd G. Sternes alone, as well as though it had been executed also by his wife. To ascertain this we have but to examine the cases prosecuted to collect damages after rights of way have been granted. These cases all show that a grant of a right of way, in general terms, is the exact counterpart of whatever damages would be considered and determined by the court and allowed in condemnation proceedings.

In Nunnamaker v. Columbia Water Power Company, 47 S. C. 485, 25 S. E. 751, 34 L. R. A. 222, 58 Am. St. Rep. 905, the Supreme Court of South Carolina declares the law as follows:

> "There is a well-settled rule to the effect that where property is purchased when it might have been condemned, the consideration is conclusively presumed to cover all damages to the remainder of the tract for which the owner could have obtained compensation in condemnation proceedings." And, quoting from an Illinois case with approval, "it is held that where a person conveys a right of way over his land, it will be conclusively 'presumed that all the damages to the balance of the land, past, present, and future, were included in the consideration paid him for his conveyance, the same as an assessment of damages on a condemnation would be presumed to embrace,'" and then says: "There are many other cases to this effect. It would be unreasonable to hold that a voluntary grant of a right of way is not as effectual to protect the grantee from suit for damages arising from its proper use, as a right of way taken under compulsory proceedings."

In Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 474 (3d Ed.), it is stated that—

> "The conveyance of land for a public purpose will ordinarily vest in the grantee the same rights as though the land had been acquired by condemnation (citing a long list of authorities). The conveyance will be held to be a release of all damages which would be presumed to be included in the award of damages if the property had been condemned. The grantor therefore cannot recover for any damages to the remainder of his land which result from the proper construction, use and operation of the works upon the property conveyed (citing innumerable authorities)."

That damages inflicted upon land not taken by seepage may be considered in condemnation proceedings seems clearly allowable. In Denver City Irrigation Co. v. Middaugh, 12 Colo. 434, 21 Pac. 565, 13 Am. St. Rep. 243, the court thus expresses its view:

> "In assessing damages in condemnation proceedings for lands taken for the purpose of constructing a ditch or reservoir thereon, injuries likely to result from seepage and leakage from such canal or reservoir would naturally be among the first items to occur to a jury."

Further:

> "An examination of the reported cases shows that there is no substantial difference in the general rules applicable to the assessment of damages in condemnation proceedings, as announced by the courts of last resort, but in the application of such rules to particular cases the same uniformity has not been observed; still no case has been called to our attention which by any fair construction can be held to be in conflict with the conclusion that damages for seepage and leakage should have been determined in the first proceeding."

In the more recent case of Farmers' Reservoir & Irrigation Co. v. Cooper, 54 Colo. 402, 130 Pac. 1004, the Supreme Court of Colorado uses the following language:

> "In condemnation proceedings all damages, present and prospective, that are the natural, necessary, or reasonable incident of taking the property sought to be condemned, must be assessed."

It was there held that seepage, and damages resulting from seepage, constituted an incident to be considered by the court or jury whenever land was taken for a right of way to construct a canal.

[3] It thus appears by an unbroken line of authorities, and also as well as by good reasoning, that whenever a grant of a right of way is executed by a landowner he thereby estops himself from afterwards prosecuting any action for the past, present, or future damages that may have occurred, or reasonably be expected to occur, by reason of the necessary, natural, and ordinary use of the utility or public service for which the right of way is granted. And this includes the natural, reasonably to be anticipated, and ordinary injury resulting to adjacent land from seepage, if the land is of a character that admits of or may be reasonably expected to admit of such action of the waters taking place.

[4] If the appellants in this case had executed a grant of a right of way, they would be barred from prosecuting an action for damages, because the law would presume that such item of damage had been considered, determined and paid for. Now, if this is true, what items of damage would the appellant be entitled to have considered by the jury in a case where they had only agreed—assuming that the contract in this case is valid—to grant a right of way after a reasonable price had been paid therefor? It seems to us that the question answers itself, and that the appellants were entitled to present to the jury and have the jury consider every item of damage or injury to their property for which they would have been entitled had condemnation proceedings been had, and which they would lawfully be authorized to consider before executing a grant of a right of way, and which the law would presume they had considered if a grant to a right of way had been executed. This evidence the appellants were precluded from introducing by reason of the construction given to the language of the contract, in which it was held that the words found therein by which the appellant Floyd G. Sternes contracted to grant the necessary rights of way at such reasonable price, etc., limited recovery to the value of the land actually taken, which holding is contrary to what the appellant would have been presumed to have considered if a right of way had actually been granted. Another way of ascertaining the meaning of the contract, assuming that the contract referred to is valid, is to inquire as to what should have been the holding of the court if an action for specific performance had been instituted by the defendant. It can hardly be doubted that the words "reasonable price" for the right of way could only be construed as reasonable compensation for the detriment caused the owners of the land. In other words, specific performance would not be granted without adequate compensation, and that adequate compensation would include just the items to which we have referred in this opinion. If such is not the correct construction of the contract, then it would be void for uncertainty or for want of consideration. Any other construction given to the contract herein would violate the constitutional provision against taking private property, etc., without compensation.

It follows, therefore, that the appellants were deprived of the opportunity of showing what reasonable compensation should be allowed for the taking of the land necessary for the actual construction of the ditch and the natural and necessary damages incident thereto, and reasonably to be anticipated as flowing therefrom; hence a new trial must be had herein, irrespective of whether section 172a of the Civil Code, as added by St. 1917, p. 829, § 2, has any application to the facts of this case, and which in any event are really immaterial, because if the appellants are entitled to full compensation, the necessity of the wife's signature to the contract becomes wholly immaterial.

For the reasons herein given, it is hereby ordered that the judgment of the trial court be, and the same is, hereby reversed.

On Rehearing.

PLUMMER, Justice pro tem. It is earnestly contended by the petitioner herein that the court did not fully consider or perhaps did not give full weight to the fact that there were two agreements executed between Floyd G. Sternes, one of the plaintiffs in this action, and the Sutter Butte Canal Company, one of the defendants, and a large number of landowners.

[5] It is further contended that the agreement executed on the 15th day of September, 1919, provided that the landowners should pay for the rights of way. The petition states:

> "Let it be borne in mind that the agreement of September 16, 1919, provided that the landowner should furnish the rights of way," etc.

If this interpretation of the contract were correct, the petitioner would be entitled to a rehearing, but is such an interpretation of the contract admissible? There are three references to the rights of way in the contract of September 15, 1919. They are, first:

> "And said second parties are willing and have agreed to advance to first party the cost of all such rights of way, construction, enlargements, ditches and works to be acquired and constructed as aforesaid."

The second reference is:

> "The cost of construction of said ditch or ditches * * * and the cost of necessary rights of way * * * shall be borne and paid by the second parties, each of the second parties paying such pro rata of said cost as the area of his land set opposite his name bears to the total area, etc.; but said ditch or ditches * * * and said rights of way shall be the property of the first party, and the second parties shall be entitled to reimbursement of said costs from the first party, without interest thereon, upon the conditions and to the extent hereinafter specified."

The third reference to the right of way in said agreement reads:

> "The amounts deposited with the first party by the second parties to cover the cost of construction of said ditches and facilities and acquisition of rights of way above referred to shall be returned by the first party to said second parties in accordance with its rules and regulations."

The agreement dated August 30, 1920, between the parties, does not alter the provisions of the original agreement as to who should pay for the rights of way, as will be seen by the opinion of the court filed herein, which quotes in full every word of the agreement of 1920 in reference to the rights of way, and as to the manner of payment therefor, which shows that the burden is squarely fixed upon the canal company.

[6] It is further contended by the petitioner that the plaintiffs herein have waived reimbursement, but the agreement of 1920 upon which such claim is based does not bear out the contention. After having provided for the rights of way as herein stated, the agreement next sets forth that the landowner shall pay the sum of $20 per acre, after crediting said party with such amount as he or she may be entitled to for the right of way granted by him or her to the first party. And then as to the payments made by the landowner, after such credits are allowed, the contract does contain a waiver in the following language:

> "Said parties making said payments shall not be entitled to reimbursement or return by the first party of any part of said payments, or of any part of said advance heretofore made by the second parties, any right of reimbursement or return thereof being hereby expressly waived and relinquished. Said parties also hereby waive and relinquish any right to claim any part of any sums of money which may be hereafter received by the first party from any other person for or on account of the construction of said ditches or other irrigation facilities, or of the costs of rights of way therefor."

This is not a waiver of any credit which it is previously expressly provided in the contract shall be given to the landowner as compensation for any right of way granted by him. It is only a waiver of any right to demand a return of any money which he may have paid after receiving the credits to which he may be found entitled. It is true that there is nothing said about consequential damages, or what shall be considered in determining the reasonable price to be paid by the canal company to the landowner by way of credits, and for that very reason the court must look to the authorities to ascertain what is included within such language, and this we have fully set forth in our previous opinion herein.

Since the writing of our first opinion herein the Appellate Court of the First District, in the case of Rockridge Place Co. v. City of Oakland, 216 Pac. 64, opinion filed April 27, 1923, has thoroughly considered the question of waiver or estoppel when applied to one's constitutional right to compensation when property is taken for a public use. It is there held that it is no bar to a claim for damages that the petitioner was one of the original petitioners for the improvement; that a waiver is not to be implied from the fact that the petitioner asked the improvement. The language of the court there used, and which is pertinent here, is:

> "A constitutional right may not be so lightly waived. There is nothing whatever in the petition, nor in the conduct of the appellant as disclosed by the record, which evidenced a purpose on his part to waive his constitutional right to claim damages to his property, caused by raising a grade of the street."

This is the language of the case of Robinson v. City of Vicksburg, 99 Miss. 439, 54 South. 858, quoted with approval by the Appellate Court.

With the amount of damages claimed, this court has nothing to do; hence the argument of petitioner based upon such figures as to what other property owners might claim need not be considered. The question at issue is not the amount—it is the right to make proof of the compensation to which the plaintiffs are entitled for and on account of the right of way taken by the canal company, and the incidental damages to their property alleged to have been caused thereby.

Another reason why a rehearing should not be granted herein, and why the appellants are entitled to a new trial, and which was not touched upon in our previous opinion, is to be found in paragraph V of the plaintiffs' complaint. It is there alleged that said defendant (canal company), in constructing said canals and ditches, willfully, unlawfully, needlessly, and wantonly damaged, injured, and destroyed plaintiffs' land, and cut the same up into small parcels against the protests of the plaintiffs, when defendants could have at all times herein mentioned before the construction of said canals and, as said defendant well knew, built said canals and ditches in such a manner and in such a location as to have caused the plaintiffs far less damage and injury; and that plaintiffs did not, and have never consented to the construction of said canals and ditches at the places and in the manner herein described; and that said defendant, acting as such public utility and as such public service corporation, took more of said land of plaintiffs than was reasonably necessary for public use, and that said canals were not located and built by said company in a manner most compatible with the public good and the least private injury. And then followed by the allegations of the complaint referred to in our previous opinion, which state a cause of action and present issues upon which the plaintiffs were entitled to introduce evidence.

The language of the agreements is not ambiguous; as we have shown by quoting therefrom, they are very clear and explicit, and we have omitted no part which would in any way change the construction which has been given upon the questions involved herein. Upon the question of rights of way and compensation therefor, both agreements are practically the same and have been considered together.

For the reasons stated in our first opinion herein, and the additional ones above stated, the petition of the defendant Sutter Butte Canal Company for a rehearing in this cause is hereby denied.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

RESETAR et al. v. LEONARDI et al.
(Civ. 2597.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 25, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑232(2)—General objection to evidence insufficient to raise objection that it tends to establish agency by estoppel which was not pleaded.

An objection to evidence as being incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial is insufficient to raise the objection that it tends to establish an ostensible agency based on estoppel which should have been and was not pleaded.

2. Appeal and error 🔑197(3)—Objection to pleading because it relied upon an ostensible agency not pleaded held not available when first raised on appeal.

An objection to a pleading in that it relied upon an ostensible agency which because it was based on the principle of estoppel should have been pleaded held not available unless raised below.

3. Principal and agent 🔑189(1)—In action based on contract made by agent, it is proper to allege contract made by principal.

In an action on a contract made by an agent, it is proper to allege that the contract was made by the principal, nor would the fact that an ostensible agency based on estoppel was sought to be established change the rule.

4. Appeal and error 🔑931(1) — All intendments and conflicting rational inferences must be resolved in favor of judgment of trial court.

On appeal all the intendments and conflicting rational inferences must be resolved in favor of the judgment of the trial court.

5. Estoppel 🔑107 — Only where party has knowledge at time of filing complaint that cause rests on estoppel is he required to plead it.

It is only where a party has knowledge at the time his complaint is filed that his cause of action must rest upon estoppel that he is required to plead it.

6. Sales 🔑52(6)—Evidence held sufficient to establish purchaser of apples was agent for defendant produce company.

In an action to recover the purchase price of two carloads of apples bought by an alleged agent of defendants and billed to defendants, evidence held sufficient to establish that the apples were sold to defendants, not to the alleged agent.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Action by Mike Resetar and others against J. Leonardi and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John R. Cronin and Ben Berry, both of Stockton, for appellants.

Scott Rex, of Stockton, and Wyckoff & Gardner, of Watsonville, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. Plaintiffs were wholesale apple merchants at Watsonville, Cal., and defendants were partners engaged in the produce and commission business under the name of "Valley Fruit & Produce Company" in the city of Stockton. Plaintiffs claim to have sold and shipped to defendants three carloads of apples in October and November, 1920. The first of these cars, consigned by respondents to themselves, with a draft on appellants attached to the bill of lading, was paid for and is not involved in this controversy, except as the facts connected therewith may have some bearing upon the question of the liability of appellants for the other two carloads, which were shipped on open account, and were never paid for. The complaint was to recover the purchase price of these, being in two counts in consequence of the two separate shipments. The two counts are similar in form, and it was alleged in the first:

> "That heretofore, and on November 5, 1920, at the special instance and request of defendants, plaintiffs sold and delivered to defendants at Watsonville, Cal., certain goods, wares, and merchandise, to wit, a carload of apples, which was of the fair and reasonable worth and value, and for which defendants promised and agreed to pay the sum of $1,750.95."

The answer of defendants denied:

> "That heretofore, and on November 5, 1920, or at any other time or at all, at the special instance and request of defendants, plaintiffs sold and delivered to defendants at Watsonville, Cal., * * * a carload of apples," or "that these defendants, or either of them, or any person acting for and on behalf of these defendants or either of them, or acting for and on behalf of the partnership known as Valley Fruit & Produce Company, ever purchased from the plaintiffs herein * * * a carload of apples or any other goods, wares, and merchandise."

There was also a specific denial that they or any one acting for them ever promised or agreed to pay to plaintiffs any sum of money whatever. The corresponding allegation of the second count of the complaint was denied in a similar manner. The trial was had without a jury, and the findings and judgment were in favor of plaintiffs for the full amount claimed, to wit, the sum of $2,892.90, from which judgment the appeal has been taken.

It may be stated at the outset that the apples were ordered from plaintiff by one Thomas Vossos, and the important and vital question in the case is whether there was sufficient evidence to support the view that he was either the actual or ostensible agent of defendants in the purchase of the apples. The main argument of both parties, presented skillfully and elaborately, is addressed to this consideration, and we have given it careful attention. Before noticing it specifically we observe the apparent failure of appellants to attach adequate significance to the authority and responsibility of the trial judge in determining the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses, and to the established limitation upon the power of an appellate court to overthrow the findings of the trial court. The rule itself, of course, is so elementary and familiar as to need no restatement.

[1, 2] Preliminarily to the main discussion we may also advert to the contention of appellants that their objection to evidence of ostensible agency should have been sustained upon the ground that, such agency being founded upon the principle of estoppel, it was necessary for plaintiffs to allege it. We see no merit in the claim. In the first place, appellants should have made this specific objection, if they intended to urge it subsequently. They contented themselves with the general objection that the evidence is "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial" and simply repeated it in response to the question of the trial judge: "Is there anything other than your general objection, can you direct my attention to anything of the reason why you object?" It is true that to one or two of the questions the specific objection that the complaint did not allege "agency" was made, but nothing said about estoppel or ostensible agency. It is quite apparent that this criticism is of that class which cannot avail a party unless timely attention is called to the supposed defect in the court below. In view of the record it may be regarded as a case tried upon the theory that both the actual and the ostensible agency of Vossos were in issue, and the situation is one for the application of the principle enunciated in Slaughter v. Goldberg, Bowen & Co., 26 Cal. App. 318, 147 Pac. 90; Cushing v. Pires, 124 Cal. 663, 57 Pac. 572; Busch v. Los Angeles Ry., 178 Cal. 536, 174 Pac. 665, 2 A. L. R. 1607, and many other decisions.

[3-5] Moreover, in an action based upon a contract made by an agent, it is proper to allege that it was made by the principal. McGibbon v. Schmidt, 172 Cal. 70, 155 Pac. 460; Montgomery v. Dorn, 25 Cal. App. 666, 145 Pac. 148. If made through an ostensible agent, the effect in law is the same as though made by an authorized agent, and there seems to be no good reason why the rule of pleading should not be the same. Indeed, this view is in harmony with the authorities cited by respondents, of which we may mention Robinson v. American Fish, etc., Co., 17 Cal. App. 212, 119 Pac. 388; Meister & Sons Co. v. Wood-Tatum Co., 26 Cal. App. 584, 147 Pac. 981; Armstrong v. Barceloux, 34 Cal. App. 433, 167 Pac. 895; Leavens v. Pinkham & McKevitt, 164 Cal. 242, 128 Pac. 399. Statements apparently to the contrary are found in some of the decisions, among which is Fritz v. Mills, 12 Cal. App. 113, 106 Pac. 725, but they should not be regarded as consistent with the principles of our modern liberal system of pleading and practice. It may be added that the cases cited by appellants in this connection are distinguishable from the situation herein, but we forbear specific notice of them other than to say that in the Fritz Case, supra, it was not alleged that the contract was executed by defendant, but that she, "through her duly authorized agent, executed her agreement in writing, wherein the said defendant agreed to sell and the plaintiff agreed to buy" the premises in controversy. Plaintiff having elected to allege that the act was performed by her duly authorized agent, and thus specifically confining her cause of action to a certain condition could not complain if the court limited the proof to that peculiar situation. The case is different, however, where the ultimate fact is alleged that the contract was made by the defendant. In such instance the allegation may be supported by proof that it was executed directly by the defendant or through her authorized or ostensible agent, as that term is defined in sections 2300, 2317 and 2334 of the Civil Code. Moreover, there is room for the claim that respondents had no reason to believe, until the trial was well under way, that the question of ostensible agency would arise. As to this there may be ground for the opposing contention, but we cannot ignore the rule that all intendments and conflicting rational inferences must be resolved in favor of the judgment of the trial court. Hence it is fair to apply the well-settled doctrine that it is only where a party has knowledge at the time his complaint is filed that his cause of action must rest upon estoppel that he is required to plead it. Donnelly v. San Francisco Bridge Co., 117 Cal. 417, 49 Pac. 559; Llewellyn Iron Works v. Kinney Co., 172 Cal. 210, 155 Pac. 986. In the former it is said:

> "Although the doctrine of ostensible agency rests upon estoppel, the plaintiff is not required to plead such estoppel, or to aver the facts constituting ostensible agency, where he believed and had come to believe that the negligent person was in fact the agent of the defendant; and a party is not bound to plead an estoppel where he is without knowledge that his claim must ultimately rest upon it."

The discussion of this point is already too greatly prolonged, and we may dismiss it with the additional reflection that most of the evidence along this line, to which objection was made, was admissible as tending to show actual as well as ostensible agency, and, even if the complaint was defective in said particular, manifestly it resulted in no prejudice to defendants.

[6] But the vital question in the case is obviously whether the evidence was sufficient to support the conclusion of the trial court as to the agency of Vossos. In the effort to maintain their position respondents have recited many circumstances relating to the various shipments, which they claim, in their cumulative force, furnish the requisite support for the finding, and we shall set them forth substantially as thus exhibited. In doing so we naturally favor respondents where there is any conflict in the evidence.

Vossos was admittedly an employee of defendants until the first week in October. He did the purchasing for the firm, and was the only person connected with them who bought and sold apples and like produce. In his work for appellants he used a Ford automobile belonging to them, and on which car was painted the name of the firm, "Valley Fruit & Produce Co., Stockton." This car was sold to Vossos in the early part of October. Prior to August 30, 1920, respondents had heard that appellants were a reliable firm, and on that date the former wrote to the latter, quoting prices on apples and soliciting an order. No answer to the letter, however, was received. On October 22 Vossos came to respondents' place of business at Watsonville, driving said car with said firm name still painted upon it, handed out the printed business card of appellants with his own name rubber-stamped thereon and negotiated for and purchased from Mike Resetar a carload of apples for the Valley Fruit & Produce Company, stating at the same time that he was "of the Valley Fruit and Produce Company." This carload was shipped out on October 25, and the next day respondents wrote and mailed a letter to appellants in which they stated:

> "You will find inclosed invoice to cover shipment of apples to you yesterday in car D., L. & W. 35810. We have drawn a draft against you for the total amount of the invoice. We hope that the fruit will give you entire satisfaction.
> "Thanking you for the order, and hoping that we may have the pleasure of filling more orders for you this season, we remain," etc.

A draft for $1,317.50 on the Valley Fruit & Produce Company was attached to the bill of lading and forwarded through the Bank of Watsonville for collection. The bill of lading showed that the car was consigned by respondents to themselves with directions to "advise Valley Fruit & Produce Company, Stockton, Cal." The draft and bill of lading were received by the First National Bank of Stockton on October 27, and the collection clerk of the bank on that day sent the Valley Fruit & Produce Company a written notice by mail, advising them of the receipt by the bank of said instruments. Defendants were also notified by telephone, and on the following day one Cochello, a groceryman of Stockton, paid the draft, he testifying at the trial that he purchased the apples from Vossos. When the car arrived at Stockton on October 28 the notice and disposition clerk of the Southern Pacific Company, Miss Eberhart, phoned the information to the Valley Fruit & Produce Company, and talked with a man who gave his name as Tom, and at the same time she made out and mailed a postal card notice, addressed to appellants, stating that the car had arrived, and the same would be delivered to them on payment of the freight and surrender of the bill of lading. On the same day this carload of apples was delivered to Cochello on payment of the freight and surrender of the bill of lading. She testified that she had no recollection of giving any notice to any one other than defendants of the arrival of this car. It thus appears that appellants were notified four different times of the arrival of the draft and bill of lading and the carload of apples —by written notice and phone from the First National Bank of Stockton, and by postal card notice and phone from the Southern Pacific office.

As to the second carload, early in November Vossos again appeared at respondents' place of business, traveling in the same automobile. He again ordered a carload of apples, requesting that it be billed on open account to appellants. They were shipped November 5, and on the next day plaintiffs wrote and mailed to defendants a letter in reference to the shipment, inclosing an invoice or bill showing the purchase price to be $1,750.95 and the bill of lading indicating that the car was consigned by respondents directly to appellants. This car arrived at Stockton November 8, and Miss Eberhart notified defendants, both by phone and by postal card, of its arrival. After the second car arrived Mr. Leonardi, who seems to have been the moving spirit and the active manager of the defendant firm, came into the Southern Pacific office and complained about the delay in the delivery of the car, such delay having been caused by the fact that the bill of lading was not presented when the first effort was made to secure the delivery of the apples. We may pause here to state that this is one of the strong and decisive facts in the case, and we have given particular attention to the claim of appellants that it was not sufficiently shown, but the testimony of two witnesses is amply sufficient, having been fully credited, as it undoubtedly was, by the trial judge, to justify the conclusion that Leonardi made such visit and such complaint. We quote from Miss Eberhart's testimony as follows:

"Q. Well, prior to the arrival of these three cars, had you seen Mr. Leonardi to know him by sight? A. Yes, sir. Q. By Mr. Leonardi I refer to the Mr. Leonardi whom the testimony in this case shows to be a member of the partnership doing business as the Valley Fruit & Produce Company? A. Yes, sir. Q. The same man, did you see him in connection with any one of these three shipments? A. As I remember, I did. Q. What do you remember? A. As near as I can remember, Mr. Leonardi came in * * * after the second car arrived and complained about the delay on the car—delay in delivery of the car."

She further described the appearance of said person, and the record further shows:

"Mr. Rex: Q. One more question: Can you identify Mr. Leonardi in court here? A. Yes, sir. Q. Who is he? A. That gentleman sitting over there next to Mr. Cronin. Q. That is all? A. I know him by sight. Mr. Rex: It will be admitted that the person pointed out by the witness is the defendant Leonardi in this case. Mr. Cronin: Yes, sir."

W. J. Fannon, who was employed in the freight office of the Southern Pacific Company, after being asked if he had seen Mr. Leonardi before, testified that he had, and that "on the delivery of the second car of apples that is the man that surrendered the bill of lading to me." Furthermore, the record of his testimony shows:

"Q. Had there been a previous effort to get those apples out without surrender of the bill of lading? A. Yes, sir. Q. And that you declined to permit? A. Yes. sir. Q. And subsequently was it on the same day that they reappeared with the bill of lading? A. Yes, sir. Q. And when the bill of lading was surrendered you say that it was Mr. Leonardi who was there? A. Yes, sir."

It is true that he appears to have been a cautious and conscientious witness, and stated that when he first came into the courtroom he was not sure that Mr. Leonardi was the man, but he added:

"This gentleman here is evidently the man that surrendered the bill of lading. Of course, he was dressed different then—in his working clothes. He did not have his glasses on."

He further stated that he had a "recollection of him coming in there, and the reason that I remember is that because he tried to raise a row with some of the S. P. employees there because they refused to deliver this car of apples to the other man without the surrender of the bill of lading; otherwise I would not have probably ever been able to recognize the man."

Thus was the identification sufficiently positive to warrant a finding that Leonardi was the man. It is also rather significant that Leonardi, when on the witness stand, did not contradict this testimony of Miss Eberhart and Mr. Fannon. In reference to the matter he was asked only this question, "Did you call at the Southern Pacific Company to pay for a carload of apples—pay the freight on a carload of apples that arrived on or about the 8th of November, 1920?" and he answered, "No, sir," but neither of these witnesses had testified that he paid the freight on the car. It may have been an inadvertence of counsel, as suggested by him, that the witness was not called upon categorically to deny the testimony of said witnesses for plaintiffs, but we are guided, of course, by the record as it is, and that record justifies the assertion that the testimony of said witnesses was not even challenged by defendants. The freight on this car was paid to the witness Fannon on November 8 by one Sourbis of the Zante Grocery Company, a relative of the Vossos brothers, who testified that he paid the freight at the request of Tom Vossos.

As to the third and last car, Vossos again visited the place of business of respondents about November 20, and the course of procedure was about the same as before except that Mike Resetar, with whom he dealt, was unable to state whether Vossos came by automobile or not. He bought another carload for the defendants, which was shipped by respondents November 22, consigned to appellants. Substantially the same course was pursued as before in sending letters and notices to defendants as to the shipment, but they made no reply. When Vossos negotiated for this purchase Mike Resetar told him that they could not sell unless he would pay for the other car, as they needed the money, but on his assurance that upon his return to Stockton he would mail a check for the amount the third carload was shipped and billed open. Miss Eberhart called Vossos by phone at the Valley Fruit & Produce Company's place of business, notified him of the arrival of the car, and, at his instruction, placed the notation on the waybill to put the car on the team track for immediate delivery. On November 26 Vossos gave a receipt for this car.

We are not unmindful of the fact that agency cannot be established by the declarations of an agent; indeed, they are not admissible for that purpose. This rule was recognized by the trial court, and the conversations between Vossos and plaintiffs were admitted only to show that respondents actually sold the apples, not to Vossos, but to defendants. It is not doubted that this was entirely proper. It may be granted also that some of the circumstances upon which respondents rely, considered separately, are of little significance; but in the aggregate they create a strong probability that Vossos was authorized to represent defendants in the purchase of the apples. Indeed, from a reading of the record it is difficult to reach any other conclusion, notwithstanding the asseverated denials of the defendants.

A few facts stand out prominently which we may recall with some particularity. Leonardi admitted that he received a telephone notice from said First National Bank of the fact that the carload of apples of October 26 had arrived. If he did not know that the shipment was upon the order of Vossos it is almost unbelievable that he would not have inquired why such freight should be intended for his firm. Appellants say that they were under no legal obligation to do so; but, be that as it may, applying the ordinary standards of human conduct, the trial court could hardly resist the conclusion that his failure to make inquiry carried with it the implication that he knew of the supposed agency of Vossos. Having this knowledge it was, of course, his duty to repudiate such agency if it did not exist, and to notify the consignor in order that he might not be thereafter imposed upon. But the more rational inference would be that Vossos was really the agent of the firm.

Another fact of equal persuasive force is the inquiry of Leonardi as to the delay in the delivery of the second carload. This is entirely inconsistent with the view that he had no knowledge of the part of Vossos in the transaction. The significance of this circumstance is indeed recognized by appellants, and they question the sufficiency of the identification of him by the witnesses, but they said he was the man, and we cannot hold that they were mistaken.

Another circumstance of monumental potency is the silence of defendants after the receipt of the numerous letters and notices which were sent to their address. It is true that defendants denied that they received them, but their story as to the delivery of the mail naturally excites incredulity, and doubtless was rejected by the trial court as improbable. Subdivision 24 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure places among the disputable presumptions the following:

> "That a letter duly directed and mailed was received in the regular course of the mail."

This presumption is evidence, and under the peculiar circumstances of the case the court was entirely warranted in following the presumption rather than the testimony of the defendants. Manifestly, if they received these letters and notices, they would be put upon inquiry, and as honest men they would notify the consignor, if, as a matter of fact, Vossos was not their agent.

The last circumstance which we emphasize is disclosed by the testimony of Miss Eberhart that when the last carload arrived on November 26 she called up the defendants at their place of business, and Mr. Vossos responded. Why should he be there to answer messages and to attend to business transactions of that kind unless it were with the knowledge, acquiescence, and authority of the defendants? This was nearly two months after appellants declared that the connection of Vossos with the firm had ceased, but this circumstance might justly be regarded by the trial court as casting discredit upon their testimony.

We have not overlooked the discussion of the legal propositions involved, but they are simple and fundamental, and demand no specific notice. It may be that Vossos was a consummate rascal, as claimed by appellants, and that they are the unfortunate victims of his evil machinations; but, having reached the conclusion that the material findings of the trial court are supported, that is the end of the matter as far as we are concerned. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. McHUGH. (Cr. 1019.)

1. Highways 🔑186—In prosecution for driving while intoxicated, exclusion of conversation of accused held not error.

In a prosecution for driving an automobile while intoxicated, where defendant's companion had testified that defendant was sick and not intoxicated, and had stated that defendant had conversed intelligibly concerning their trip previous to the accident resulting in their arrest, held, that it was not error to exclude testimony as to the particular subjects of the conversation had.

2. Witnesses 🔑245—Exclusion of statements made by one accused of driving automobile while intoxicated relating to his physical condition held not error.

In a prosecution for driving an automobile while intoxicated, defended on the ground that accused was sick and not intoxicated, the exclusion of testimony by accused's companion as to statements by accused concerning his physical condition, held not error, where the witness had already testified that accused had complained of being faint and ill, and that he appeared extremely nervous.

3. Highways 🔑186—In prosecution for driving while intoxicated, evidence held immaterial and properly excluded.

In a prosecution for driving an automobile while intoxicated, where it appeared that accused's companion, just after a collision which resulted in their arrest, had given a name other than his own, held, that it was not error to exclude testimony as to his reasons for so doing, they being immaterial on the question of accused's guilt.

4. Criminal law 🔑485(1)—Exclusion of expert testimony in answer to hypothetical question, which did not state all facts and circumstances in evidence, held not error.

In a prosecution for driving an automobile while intoxicated, held, that it was not error to exclude testimony of a physician in answer to a hypothetical question which did not contain a statement of all the facts and circumstances which had been put in evidence by the prosecution.

5. Criminal law 🔑1170(2)—In prosecution for driving automobile while intoxicated, exclusion of testimony of physician relating to allegation of whether accused was intoxicated held not prejudicial error.

In a prosecution for driving an automobile while drunk, the exclusion of a physician's testimony in answer to the question, "Doctor, could one accurately determine whether or not a person were intoxicated without knowing the history of the case?" held not prejudicial error, where facts, relied on to show other testimony unreliable as to defendant's condition, were already clearly before the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; George Samuels, Judge.

Joseph J. McHugh was convicted of driving an automobile while intoxicated, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Alexander O'Grady, of San Francisco, and William R. Geary, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment convicting him of driving an automobile in the county of Alameda while intoxicated. The defendant was sentenced to imprisonment for six months in the county jail.

The evidence overwhelmingly sustains the charge against the defendant, and the matters urged upon the appeal are all in relation to rulings made by the trial judge upon the admission of testimony at the trial.

While driving in Alameda county the defendant collided with an automobile which was at a standstill at the side of the road. Several persons who were in the automobile which was struck testified to the intoxicated condition of the defendant, as did also passers-by and the police officers who arrested the defendant and who drove him away from the scene of the accident. Several bottles of whisky were found in the defendant's automobile, some of them filled and others partially emptied, and it appears that the defendant was unable to leave his vehicle unaided and had to be assisted by the police officers, and that, upon being removed from his car, and before he could be placed in the patrol wagon, he fell to the sidewalk when the officers released their hold of him for a moment. There are also numerous other matters appearing in the record which tend to sustain the charge made against the defendant.

[1] The defendant had with him in his automobile at the time of the accident a friend, Thomas Stallard, and two women. Stallard was called as a witness in aid of the defense, which was that defendant was ill and not intoxicated upon the occasion in question. Appellant complains because of a ruling of the trial court in relation to the testimony of Stallard. He testified in detail as to the defendant's activities from the time the party started upon the ride which ended so disastrously until the time of his arrest. Stallard was asked if he had been conversing with the defendant during the drive. He replied that he had. He was asked what had been the subject of the conversation. He replied that the conversation had been about their trip. He also testified that he had observed the condition of the defendant, and that he was not intoxicated; that he was not under the influence of liquor. He was asked if the remarks of the defendant during the ride were intelligent and understandable, to which he replied: "Oh, yes; I could understand him, yes." He was then asked, again, what the defendant and he had been speaking of prior to the collision. Objection was made to this question and sustained. The appellant now contends that this ruling was error, and maintains that, as he was seeking to refute the statements of the witnesses for the prosecution to the effect that he was intoxicated, the jury should have been informed as to the nature of his conversation immediately prior to the accident, so as to be able to determine whether or not such conversation indicated intoxication. The contention of appellant is that the witness Stallard, had he been permitted to answer the question to which objection was made, would have outlined a conversation had between himself and defendant which would have indicated that the defendant was entirely rational and normal at that time. However, the jury was told by Stallard that the defendant was entirely rational, that his conversation was intelligible and that he was not intoxicated. If they believed this testimony, it could not have been strengthened by a narration of the particular subjects of conversation. As the trial court remarked in ruling on the testimony sought to be elicited by counsel, the witness had testified that the conversation of the defendant was intelligent and that he was sober, and nothing more could be added to strengthen the defense relied upon by going into the details of the conversation.

[2] Objection is next made to the ruling of the court sustaining objection to a question asked Mr. Stallard as to whether or not, just prior to the accident, the defendant had complained to Stallard concerning his physical condition. It is contended that such testimony was admissible under the exception to the hearsay rule which admits declarations of one whose sanity is in question, not as evidence of the truth of the facts recited, but as evidence of the state of mind of the person making the declaration. Be that as it may, the testimony sought to be introduced was already before the jury, as this same witness testified that the defendant had complained to him of being faint; that he complained of being ill; that he appeared to be extremely nervous.

[3] Upon cross-examination of the witness Stallard, the prosecution brought out the fact that immediately after the accident Stallard had given his name as Kelly and had stated that he and not the defendant was driving the automobile. This was admitted without objection, and upon redirect examination the attorney for the defendant asked him why he had given the name of Kelly. Objection was made and sustained to the question. He was also asked why he had stated to those present at the scene of the accident that he and not the defendant was driving the automobile. Objection was made and sustained to this question. The conduct of Stallard was not relevant upon the question of the defendant's guilt, and we do not think his reasons for what he did were material.

[4] The remaining objections of the appellant are made to the rulings of the court excluding testimony of defendant's physician, in reply to a hypothetical question and in reply to the following question: "Doctor, could one accurately determine whether or not a person were intoxicated without knowing the history of the case?"

We think the objection to the hypothetical question was properly sustained. The question narrated a number of facts which had been testified to by the witnesses for the defendant, but omitted many of the facts and circumstances which had been put in evidence by the prosecution, and then asked whether, in the light of the facts narrated, the doctor would say that a person was under the influence of liquor or that the manifestations and conditions narrated were due to something besides intoxication. An opinion given by an expert upon a partial statement of the facts is inadmissible and of no value. Encyclopedia of Evidence, vol. 5, pp. 627, 628.

[5] As to the other question addressed to the doctor and set out herein, to which an objection was sustained, it is urged by the appellant that it was competent for him to prove that intoxication is a medical disease and cannot be diagnosed without a knowledge of the history of the case. It is argued that, upon proving this fact, it would follow that the opinions of the witnesses produced by the prosecution to the effect that the defendant was intoxicated were of no value because based merely upon external symptoms and not upon a history of the case. The defendant's contention upon this matter was clearly before the jury, as appears from a reading of the entire transcript. Upon cross-examination of the witnesses for the prosecution, the attorney for the defendant brought out clearly the fact that such witnesses were not experts upon intoxication; that they judged merely from objective symptoms, which they narrated. They admitted that such symptoms, individually and in combination, were consistent with a condition other than intoxication, as well as with a condition of intoxication, but they, nevertheless, stated as their opinions, based upon their general information and observation, that the defendant was intoxicated. The jury was at liberty to accept or reject these opinions of the witnesses for the prosecution. In the testimony of the defendant's physician the jury had before it other facts which, conceivably, might have explained the defendant's conduct, and which made up the so-called history of the case. But these latter facts did not explain the defendant's conduct to the satisfaction of the jury and its view of the matter is amply justified by the entire record. We find no miscarriage of justice in the verdict.

PEOPLE v. COCKRILL et al. (Cr. 655.)

1. Indictment and information 🔑159(2)—Conviction under indictment so amended as to state an offense absolutely void.

Where an indictment in the first instance states no offense, but is amended so that it does state an offense, a conviction under the indictment so amended is coram non judice, and absolutely void, under Pen. Code, § 1008.

2. Indictment and information 🔑110(2)—Departure from language of statute in defining crime immaterial if crime charged with clearness equal to language of statute.

In those cases in which the crime may properly be stated in a criminal pleading in the exact language of the statute defining it, a departure from the precise language of the statute in setting forth the crime in an indictment or information will not have the effect of vitiating the pleading if the language employed in such pleading describes the offense sought to be charged with clearness equal to that of the language of the statute itself.

3. Conspiracy 🔑43(1)—Indictment under Alien Land Law charging conspiracy to "purchase" real property in violation thereof held to state an offense.

An indictment for violating the Alien Land Law, forbidding conspiracy "to effect a transfer of real property" in violation of its provisions, alleging that defendants, one of whom was an alien ineligible to citizenship of this country, conspired to "purchase" certain real property, held to state an offense; the word "purchase" meaning "to acquire; to buy for a price," and in law including every mode of coming to an estate except by inheritance.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Purchase.]

4. Conspiracy 🔑43(1)—Indictment for violating Alien Land Law held not invalid for failing to allege that land acquired was agricultural or farming land.

An indictment for conspiring to violate the Alien Land Law, escheating agricultural or farming land acquired by aliens ineligible to citizenship, held not void for failing expressly to allege that the property purchased by defendants was agricultural or farming land, or not land which such alien might acquire for residential or commercial purposes.

5. Indictment and information 🔑111(1)—Indictment under Alien Land Law not invalid for failing to negative acquisition of lands to satisfy liens.

An indictment for conspiring to violate the Alien Land Law, escheating to the state lands of a certain class acquired by aliens ineligible to citizenship, was not invalid because it failed to allege that the acquisition of the land was not to be consummated for the purpose of enforcing or satisfying any lien existing upon real property at the time of the enactment of the law.

6. Indictment and information 🔑159(2)—Amendment of indictment for conspiring to violate Alien Land Law held not to prejudice rights of defendants.

In a prosecution for conspiring to violate the Alien Land Law, the substantial rights of the defendants were not prejudiced under Pen. Code, § 1008, by permitting the indictment to be amended so as to state the offense or the transaction from which it arose in greater detail; the substance of the crime charged not being affected.

7. Conspiracy 🔑44½—Instruction in prosecution for conspiring to violate Alien Land Law incorporating provisions of act as to prima facie presumption of intent held not error.

In a prosecution for conspiring to violate the Alien Land Law, it was proper for the court to incorporate in its charge a portion of the law providing that a prima facie presumption that the conveyance is made with intent to avoid escheat shall arise upon proof of the taking of the property in the name of a person other than certain persons mentioned in the act if the consideration is paid or agreed to be paid by an alien, since, under Pen. Code, § 1102, rules of evidence in civil actions are applicable also to criminal actions, and it not appearing that it was the legislative intent that such presumption should have application only under civil cases in escheat.

8. Aliens 🔑10—Constitutional law 🔑250—Alien Land Law as to presumption of intent to evade escheat held not to deny equal protection of the law.

That provision of the Alien Land Law raising a prima facie presumption that a conveyance under the act is made with intent to evade escheat where the property is taken in the name of one person and the consideration to be paid by an alien does not deny to any person or class of persons within the state the equal protection of the law guaranteed by Const. U. S. art. 14, § 1.

9. Treaties 🔑13—Alien Land Law held not to infringe rights guaranteed to alien Japanese denizens.

Alien Land Law, § 9, providing that a prima facie presumption of intent to evade escheat shall arise when the property is taken in the name of one and the consideration is to be paid by an alien, held not to infringe any rights guaranteed to alien Japanese denizens within the state of California by article 1, par. 3, of the Treaty of 1911 between the United States and Japan.

10. Constitutional law 🔑250—Legislature may change any rule of evidence, and place upon defendant in a criminal case a heavier burden.

It is within the constitutional right of the Legislature or of the people in the exercise of the powers of initiative which they have reserved to themselves to change any rule of evidence now existing, and to place upon defendant in a criminal case of whatsoever character a heavier burden in the trial of the charge against him than he is under the existing system required to bear.

11. Conspiracy 🔑47—Provision as to presumptions in Alien Land Law held not to change burden of proving guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

Alien Land Law, § 9, providing that a prima facie presumption that a conveyance under the act is made with intent to evade escheat shall arise upon proof of the taking of the property in the name of one person, the consideration to be paid by an alien, does not relieve the people of the burden of proving the guilt of persons prosecuted under section 10 of such act beyond every reasonable doubt.

12. Conspiracy 🔑48—Instructions advisable in prosecutions under Alien Land Law stated.

In conspiracy prosecutions for violating Alien Land Law, where an instruction declaring the prima facie presumption provided by section 9 of the act is given, such instruction should always be accompanied by an instruction that the burden thus placed upon defendants charged under section 10 of the act was only such as required defendants to introduce evidence sufficient to create a reasonable doubt of their guilt.

13. Criminal law 🔑822(11)—Instruction as to prima facie presumption in prosecution for conspiring to violate Alien Land Law held not to place undue burden of proof upon defendants.

In a prosecution for conspiring to violate the Alien Land Law by the purchase of agricultural land to be owned by an alien Japanese, where the court had charged the prima facie presumption of intent to evade escheat as stated in the act, such instruction did not have the effect of attaching to defendants any further burden than that of creating by the introduction of testimony in rebuttal of the presumption a reasonable doubt of their guilt, in view of other instructions given.

14. Criminal law 🔑1169(1)—Introduction in evidence of discussion by defendant before grand jury of meaning of Alien Land Law held harmless error.

In a prosecution for conspiring to violate Alien Land Law it was not prejudicial error to admit in evidence certain statements made by one of the defendants before the grand jury relating to the transaction involved, and which consisted entirely of a discussion between the district attorney, his assistant, defendant, and some of the grand jurors, as to the meaning of the several provisions of the law.

15. Conspiracy 🔑45—Discussion by defendant and grand jurors as to meaning of law charged to have been violated held admissible to show defendant's intent.

In a prosecution for conspiring to violate the Alien Land Law, brought against an alien Japanese and his attorney, a discussion between such attorney and others before the grand jury as to the meaning of certain provisions of the law was admissible in evidence at the trial against the attorney as tending to reveal such attorney's real intentions with regard to the transaction upon which the charge was based.

16. Conspiracy 🔑47—Evidence held to sustain conviction for conspiring to violate Alien Land Law.

In a prosecution of an alien Japanese and his attorney for conspiring to violate the Alien Land Law in procuring the execution of a contract, whereby the alien was to purchase agricultural land in violation of the act, evidence held to sustain a conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

W. A. Cockrill and Y. Akada, also known as S. Akada, were convicted of conspiracy to violate the Alien Land Law, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Seawell, J., having been trial judge, does not participate herein.

Chas. A. Wetmore, Jr., of Marysville, Gillogley, Crofton & Payne, of San Francisco, and Frank A. Duryea, of Marysville, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendants, Cockrill, a lawyer by profession, and Akada, a native of Japan, were indicted by the grand jury of Sonoma county for the crime of conspiring to cause or effect the transfer of real property to an alien ineligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States, in violation of the provisions of an initiative act adopted by the people at the general election held on November 2, 1920 (St. 1921, p. lxxxiii), and designated and known as the "Alien Land Law." The defendants demurred to the indictment on general and special grounds, and also moved to set it aside for alleged statutory reasons. The motion was disallowed, but the district attorney, conceding the force of the demurrer in a certain particular, was, upon motion, allowed to amend the indictment. Like proceedings were had as to the amended indictment, and, by leave of the court, the district attorney again amended the indictment, and it was upon the second amended indictment that the defendants were finally arraigned, tried, and convicted of the crime above stated.

At the time fixed for the arraignment of the defendants for sentence, the latter, through their counsel, interposed a motion in arrest of judgment and also a motion for a new trial, both of which were denied. The appeal is by the defendants from the judgment and the order denying their application for a new trial.

The transaction out of which this prosecution developed took place on the 26th day of August, 1921, negotiations for its consummation having previously been carried on for several weeks by the defendants with B. C. Souza and Mae C. Souza, his wife, the parties owning the land involved in the transaction. The Souzas were the owners of approximately 30 acres of agricultural land situated near Petaluma, in Sonoma county. When the defendants proposed to purchase the land the Souzas stated to them that, if the purchase of the land was to be made for Akada himself, and the property to be for his own possession, occupation, and use, they did not think that the sale could be made under the law, referring, of course, to the Alien Land Law. Akada and his wife (also a native of Japan) had, prior to the transaction here involved, lived on a farm in Sonoma county for a number of years, and during that time several children were born to them, and both Akada and Cockrill declared to the Souzas that the land was to be purchased for the American-born children of said Akada. After considerable discussion of the matter Cockrill, so the Souzas testified, stated that he had consulted the district attorney of Sonoma county about the transaction, and had been advised by that official that, if the land was to be purchased for the American-born children of Akada, the transaction would be perfectly legal. This statement was positively denied by the district attorney. He testified that no such advice was given by him to Cockrill; that the latter had never consulted him about the matter.

Finally a written agreement for the purchase of the land, dated the 26th day of August, 1921, was entered into between the Souzas and the defendant Cockrill whereby the land was sold to the latter for the sum of $2,250. Upon the execution of this agreement Cockrill paid the vendors the sum of $150. The agreement provided that on the execution of a deed and certificate of title to the property the sum of $1,100 was to be paid, and that the balance of the purchase price, $1,000, was "to be covered by a mortgage on said property, said mortgage to be held by parties of the first part (the Souzas) or their assigns." The Souzas, as we have stated, testified that the defendants represented to them at all times that the land was to be purchased for and to be owned by the American-born children of the defendant Akada. Akada furnished the money with which the payments on the land were made.

It appears that the abstract of title disclosed some defects in the title, and on September 24, 1921, Cockrill, representing the Souzas as their attorney, commenced a suit to quiet title in the superior court of Sonoma county. There is no question raised here as to the fact that four of the children of Akada, for whom it was claimed by Cockrill and Akada the land was purchased, were of American birth.

After the action to quiet title was commenced Cockrill was subpœnaed to appear before the grand jury to give testimony as to the transaction. Before the inquisitorial body he testified that Akada purchased the property for his American-born children; that the contract of sale was taken in Cockrill's name, as trustee for said children, and that the intention was to complete the transaction by taking a deed in the name of said children and then having a guardian of their estates appointed for them.

It appears that at the time of the several transactions herein referred to, while believing that Akada's native-born children could take title to agricultural lands in this state, and that it was not unlawful for him (Akada) to furnish the money for the purchase of such lands for such purpose, Cockrill was of the opinion that an alien Japanese father could not act as guardian of his children's estate, and hence "arrangements were made to have an American citizen appointed as such guardian as soon as the title should be found good and the actual transfer made." Parenthetically, we may say that the Supreme Court, in the case of Estate and Guardianship of Yano, 206 Pac. 995, decided subsequently to the transactions above referred to, held that an alien incapable of becoming a citizen of this country may not only furnish the money for the purchase of agricultural lands for his American-born children, but may also act as guardian of the persons and estate of such children.

There was testimony to the effect that, upon the execution of the agreement of purchase and sale, the defendant Akada commenced to improve the land by erecting thereon a number of buildings which, aside from the one in which he and his family were to reside, were to be used as "chicken houses." All this testimony was by the court limited in its application to the defendant Akada. There were also admitted in evidence certain statements made by Cockrill and Akada when testifying before the grand jury regarding the transaction involved herein, as was also an extrajudicial statement by Akada relative to said transaction, in which, however, he declared that the property was bought for his children, but in which he gave what appears to be an inconsistent explanation as to the source from which the money used in purchasing the property came.

The above statement embraces substantially all evidence of material importance introduced by the people in support of the charge. As to the defense, Cockrill's testimony was all that was received in rebuttal of the showing made by the people, Akada not having been called to testify. Cockrill's testimony consisted of an effort on his part to explain that the transaction involving the purchase of the land was carried on in good faith, and according to a conscientious interpretation by him of the provisions of the Alien Land Law, and that the intention was to purchase the land for Akada's American-born children.

The defendants advance a number of points on which they claim to be entitled to a reversal of the judgment and the order. Most of these points, while involving challenges of the legal soundness of certain given instructions and the action of the court in disallowing others proposed by defendants, and rulings of the court as to the admissibility of certain evidence, in reality involve an assault upon certain portions of the Alien Land Law upon the ground of their alleged invalidity. These points we will now proceed to consider.

1. The defendants vigorously contend that, in allowing the purported indictment to be amended, the court committed error in this: That the indictment, as originally filed, did not state an offense under the act in question, and hence no amendment thereof, even if thus an offense under said law was stated, could make it an indictment, since the situation in such case would be as if the grand jury had not found and presented an indictment against the accused.

The authority for the allowance of amendments of indictments and informations is in section 1008 of the Penal Code, so much of which as is apposite to the present consideration reads as follows:

> "An indictment or information may be amended by the district attorney without leave of court, at any time before the defendant pleads. Such amendment may be made at any time thereafter, in the discretion of the court where it can be done without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant. An indictment cannot be amended so as to change the offense charged, nor an information so as to charge an offense not shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination."

The particulars in which it is claimed that the indictment as originally filed was insufficient because of the want of facts or in the statement of the offense thereby sought to be charged are as follows:

> "First, the indictment did not charge that the land involved was agricultural land, or that it was not land which an alien Japanese might acquire for residence or commercial purposes in accordance with the treaty between the United States and Japan.
> "Second, the grand jury did not find or charge that the transaction was for the use or benefit in any way of the defendant Akada.
> "Third, the grand jury did not find or charge that the land was not to be acquired for the use and benefit of defendant Cockrill, in whose name the contract was taken.
> "Fourth, the grand jury did not find or charge that the contract was not taken, or that the land was not to be finally transferred, in satisfaction of any lien thereof."

[1] Clearly, if the document filed as an indictment in the first instance stated no offense under the Alien Land Law, and the purported second amended indictment, upon which the accused were tried, does state such an offense, then it must be held that the purported trial and the conviction of the defendants were coram non judice, and absolutely void, inasmuch as the document purporting to be the second amended indictment would be no indictment at all, it not having been found and presented by the grand jury. Nor could the document stand as an information, since the prerequisites of the filing of an information are wanting. Sections 809, 872, Pen. Code.

The primary question, then, is whether the "original indictment" stated an offense under the Alien Land Law; and this question must be determined upon a consideration of certain provisions of said law and certain provisions of the Treaty between this government and the Empire of Japan. 37 St. 1504.

The first section of the act in question reads as follows:

> "All aliens eligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States may acquire, possess, enjoy, transmit and inherit real property, or any interest therein, in this state, in the same manner and to the same extent as citizens of the United States, except as otherwise provided by the laws of this state."

Section 2 provides:

> "All aliens other than those mentioned in section one of this act may acquire, possess, enjoy and transfer real property, or any interest therein, in this state, in the manner and to the extent and for the purpose prescribed by any treaty now existing between the government of the United States and the nation or country of which such alien is a citizen or subject, and not otherwise."

Section 7 reads in part as follows:

> "Any real property hereafter acquired in fee in violation of the provisions of this act by any alien mentioned in section 2 of this act, or by any company, association or corporation mentioned in section 3 of this act, shall escheat to, and become and remain the property of the state of California. * * * The provisions of this section and of sections 2 and 3 of this act shall not apply to any real property hereafter acquired in the enforcement or in satisfaction of any lien now existing upon, or interest in such property, so long as such real property so acquired shall remain the property of the alien, company, association or corporation acquiring the same in such manner. No alien, company, association or corporation mentioned in section 2 or section 3 hereof shall hold for a longer period than two years the possession of any agricultural land acquired in the enforcement of or in satisfaction of a mortgage or other lien hereafter made or acquired in good faith to secure a debt."

The first part of section 8 contains a similar provision as to escheat in relation to any leasehold or other interest in real property less than the fee acquired in violation of the provisions of the act by an alien mentioned in section 2 of said act, or by any alien, company, association or corporation mentioned in section 3. There are other provisions in said section which are not material to this inquiry.

Section 10, upon which the indictment herein is predicated, reads as follows:

> "If two or more persons conspire to effect a transfer of real property, or of an interest therein, in violation of the provisions hereof, they are punishable by imprisonment in the county jail or state penitentiary not exceeding two years, or by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or both."

The initial clause of article 1 of the Treaty between the United States and Japan reads as follows:

> "The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall have liberty to enter, travel and reside in the territories of the other to carry on trade, wholesale and retail, to own or lease and occupy houses, manufactories, warehouses and shops, to employ agents of their choice, to lease land for residential and commercial purposes, and generally to do anything incident to or necessary for trade upon the same terms as native citizens or subjects, submitting themselves to the laws and regulations there established."

It will be noted that sections 1 and 2 of the Alien Land Law describe and designate the classes of aliens competent to acquire and possess real property in this state, the first including all that class of aliens that are eligible to acquire the rights of citizenship in the United States, and the second embracing all aliens, whether they are or are not eligible to citizenship of this country, that are entitled to acquire and possess real property by virtue of the provisions of any treaty between this government and the country of which such aliens are natives guaranteeing such right.

While section 3 is not particularly important to the discussion of the points herein made, it may be explained that it guarantees the right to own real property by such aliens as are not mentioned in sections 1 and 2 as may constitute a majority of the members of any company, association, or corporation, organized under the laws of this state or any other state or nation, or who hold a majority of the issued capital stock of said company, etc., and which corporation is authorized to acquire, possess, enjoy, and convey real property or any interest therein in this state, in the manner and to the extent and for the purposes prescribed by any treaty existing at the time of the enactment of said law between the government of the United States and the nation or country of which such members or stockholders are citizens or subjects. Obviously no other class of aliens ineligible to become citizens of the United States than those classes mentioned in the above sections of the Alien Land Law are entitled to acquire agricultural or farming land in this state.

With this understanding of the provisions of the Alien Land Law and the provisions of the treaty between this government and the government of Japan which are pertinent to the present investigation, we will proceed to an examination of the indictment as it was found and presented by the grand jury to the superior court. That pleading is in the following language:

> "W. A. Cockrill and Y. Akado are accused by the grand jury of the county of Sonoma, state of California, by this indictment, found this 15th day of November one thousand nine hundred and twenty-one, of the crime of conspiracy to effect a transfer of real property in violation of the Alien Land Law of the state of California, committed as follows:
> "The said W. A. Cockrill and Y. Akado, on or about the 19th day of September, nineteen hundred and twenty-one, at and in said county of Sonoma, state of California, that the said defendants W. A. Cockrill and Y. Akado did then and there willfully, unlawfully and feloniously conspire together to effect a transfer of real property in the county of Sonoma, state of California, and an interest therein, and did so willfully, unlawfully and feloniously take and enter into an agreement to purchase certain real property from Bartholomeu C. Souza and Mary C. Souza in the name of said defendant W. A. Cockrill, and paid thereon on the purchase price thereof the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars, lawful money of the United States, which said money so paid on said purchase price was paid by said defendant Y. Akado, said Y. Akado being an alien and a subject of the Empire of Japan, and not being then and there an alien eligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States, and there not being then and there any treaty existing between the government of the United States and the government of the Empire of Japan providing for the acquiring, possessing, enjoying and transferring real property or any interest therein, contrary to the form, force and effect of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California."

[2, 3] It will be observed that the indictment, as it was originally framed, is substantially in the language of section 10, upon which it was founded. It is true that the pleader in preparing the indictment used the word "purchase," which is not employed in section 10, in the place of the word "transfer," which is used in said section in defining the offense. In other words, the indictment, in the place of alleging in that portion thereof directly charging the offense that the defendants unlawfully, etc., did "conspire to effect a transfer," etc., as is the language of section 10, alleges that the defendants did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously take and enter into an agreement "to purchase certain real property," etc. But, even in those cases in which the crime may properly be stated in a criminal pleading in the exact language of the statute defining it, a departure from the precise language of the statute in setting forth the crime in an indictment or information will not have the effect of vitiating the pleading if the language employed in such pleading describes the offense sought to be so charged with clearness equal to that of the language of the statute itself. Indeed, the word "purchase," taken alone, and as it is used in the present case, is much more scopeful than would be the word "transfer," taken alone, if it were likewise used. To say that one had effected the transfer of real property without further explanation or amplification of the proposition would be ambiguous as to the persons by whom and to whom the transfer is made. In the present case, for instance, if there was nothing more in the indictment than the allegation that the defendants had formed a conspiracy to effect a transfer of real property contrary to the provisions of the Alien Land Law, the indictment would be obnoxious to the objection of uncertainty and ambiguity. In fact, it would probably be held not to state an offense under the law. The word "purchase" has a definite and well-understood juridical meaning. Indeed, its meaning in a juridical sense is quite synonymous with its signification as it is colloquially used and understood, and, when used for the purpose of characterizing a transaction involving property of any kind, it is readily to be understood therefrom that there has been an acquisition by one or more parties of the title to such property. "Purchase," states Webster in his dictionary, means "to acquire; to buy for a price." This is undoubtedly the popular meaning. In law it "includes every mode of coming to an estate except by inheritance." Greer v. Blanchar, 40 Cal. 194, 197. In Marsh v. Lott, 8 Cal. App. 384, 391, 97 Pac. 163, which was a suit for the specific performance of a contract of option to buy real property, and in which agreement it was covenanted that the proposed vendee was thereby given "an option to purchase" certain real property, the appellate court had occasion to interpret the word "purchase" as used in such agreement, and in explaining the meaning of said word said:

> "By reference to said agreement, we find that she gave plaintiff an option to purchase her property. The word 'purchase' implies the acquisition of; so that he (proposed vendee) was given the right to acquire the property of defendant, which in this case could not be otherwise than by a deed of conveyance."

Thus must it readily be seen that, in alleging that the defendants, one of whom was an alien ineligible to citizenship of this country, conspired to purchase certain real property, the indictment stated an offense against which the statute inveighs. In other words, the sum and substance of the charge as laid in the indictment before its amendment was that the defendants, one an alien legally incapable of becoming a citizen of the United States, and the other, as we may assume from his name, a citizen of this country or, if not already one, a person who is eligible to become such, entered into a conspiracy to effect a transfer to themselves of certain real property, contrary to the terms of the Alien Land Law of the state of California and that, in pursuance of the execution of such conspiracy, they committed two distinct overt acts, to wit: (1) That they entered into a written agreement with the owners of said real property for the acquisition thereof; (2) that, on the execution of said agreement, they paid to the vendors, with money furnished by the alleged alien defendant, the sum of $150 on the purchase price. Section 1104, Pen. Code. Of course, the indictment necessarily means that the intent of the defendants was to prevent, evade, or avoid an escheat as provided in the act.

[4] But, as we have seen, it is urged that, to state an offense under the law in question, it was necessary that there should have been an allegation in the indictment that the real property which it is alleged was purchased by the defendants was agricultural or farming land, or not land which such alien may acquire for residential or commercial purposes. It is to be conceded that, as it was originally framed, the indictment is by no means a model criminal pleading. It is further to be conceded that, since under their treaty rights Japanese aliens may own certain houses, manufactories, shops, etc., and which possibly might be susceptible of the construction that thus they are guaranteed the right to own the land upon which such houses, etc., were erected and are maintained, it would have been the result only of the exercise of wisdom if the pleader, in drafting the indictment, had also alleged that the real property which it is charged that the defendants acquired or entered into an agreement to acquire was agricultural or farming land; still, as is to be understood from what we have said above, we do not think that allegation was indispensably essential to the statement of the offense denounced by section 10 of the act. In construing the indictment we must consider section 10, on which it is based, together with the other provisions of the Alien Land Law and the provision of the treaty between this government and the empire of Japan guaranteeing to alien Japanese certain rights as to real property. Thus viewing the indictment, it seems to us that but one conclusion can follow, and that is that the "real property" which that pleading charges the defendants with having conspired to acquire is the "real property" which the act in question declares that an alien ineligible to citizenship of the United States has no right to acquire or own in this state. The defendants could not have misunderstood the indictment to mean anything else, and it must therefore be held as true, as we have hitherto declared, that the indictment as it was presented to the superior court by the grand jury, while inartificially phrased, was, in all other respects, sufficient to notify the defendants of the particular offense with which they were charged, so that they could not be misled as to its real meaning, or placed in such a position as not to be able to meet by any defense they may have the charge of conspiring to effect the transfer of agricultural land to an alien not competent under our laws to become a citizen or acquire the rights of citizenship of the United States. This is all that is required of any criminal pleading. It may be added that the evidence without conflict shows that the "real property" referred to in the indictment was farming land, and that the defendants, from the character of the cross-examination of the witnesses for the prosecution, appeared to have understood that the indictment so charged.

[5] It was not necessary, in the statement of the offense denounced by section 10 of the act in question, to allege that the acquisition of said land was not to be consummated for the purpose of enforcing or satisfying any lien existing upon real property at the time of the enactment of the Alien Land Law. Indeed, the very allegation that the defendants conspired to purchase certain real property itself plainly negatives the existence of the exception relating to the acquisition of real property through the enforcement or satisfaction of any lien or mortgage, provided in section 7 of the Alien Land Law.

The amended indictment added the allegation that the real property concerned herein was agricultural and farming land; that the contract was taken in the name of the defendant Cockrill for the "use, benefit, enjoyment, possession, occupation, and control of defendant Akada"; that there was no provision in the treaty between the United States and Japan guaranteeing to Japanese aliens the right to acquire agricultural land. The second amended indictment, in addition to the matters set out in the amended indictment, supplied the omission in the amended indictment to state the time at which the alleged crime was committed; that the said land "was and is not acquired in the enforcement or satisfaction of any lien," etc.; that the land was taken in the name of the defendent Cockrill, for the use and benefit of the defendant Akada, "with the intent and for the purpose of preventing, evading, and avoiding the escheating of said land and property to the state"; that defendant Cockrill had no interest in the fee of said land or otherwise.

The only material change made by either amendment was that involved in the allegation that the real property which the defendants conspired to have transferred to themselves was "agricultural or farming land." The other changes were not essential to the statement of the offense. We have already disposed of the proposition that the indictment should have alleged that the land was not acquired in the enforcement or satisfaction of any lien, etc. The allegation that Cockrill had no interest in the fee is immaterial, since the indictment, as originally presented, alleged that the land was purchased by him and the defendant Akada, thus showing that Akada himself had acquired an interest in the land, and that the purpose of the conspiracy or combination between him and Cockrill was to effect that result with respect to said real property.

[6] It is clear that it cannot be held that the change effected in the indictment by the amendment thereof, as above indicated, affected the substance of the crime charged, but merely resulted in stating the offense or the transaction from which it arose in greater detail. Precisely the same offense as was stated in the indictment as it was originally framed is merely set forth with more particularity in the indictment as amended. The substantial rights of the defendants could not, therefore, have been prejudiced by the amendment. Section 1008, Pen. Code. We may add that, since the indictment, both as originally filed and as amended, stated the offense designed to be therein charged, and the original indictment appearing to have been found, indorsed, returned, and presented according to the requirements of the law, the motions to set aside the amended and second amended indictment were properly denied. And for the reasons stated above in holding that the indictment, as originally framed, was exempt from the claims of the demurrer thereto, the motion in arrest of judgment was properly denied.

2. The next assignment which is to be considered is that the court committed error resulting in serious prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendants by incorporating into its charge and thus reading to the jury certain provisions of the Alien Land Law. The provisions made a part of the court's charge to the jury comprehend all of sections 1, 2, and 10 and a portion of section 9 of said act. Sections 1, 2, and 10 are hereinabove reproduced. As to these, as parts of the court's charge, there is no objection suggested. It is, however, objected that it was error from which the defendants sustained serious damage to their substantial rights for the court to have embraced within its charge that portion of section 9 of the act establishing a disputable presumption of the guilt of persons charged under section 10 upon the proof of certain facts. So much of said section as was included within the charge to the jury reads as follows:

> "Every transfer of real property, or of any interest therein, though colorable in form, shall be void as to the state and the interest thereby conveyed or sought to be conveyed shall escheat to the state if the property interest involved is of such a character that an alien mentioned in section two hereof is inhibited from acquiring, possessing, enjoying or transferring it, and if the conveyance is made with intent to prevent, evade or avoid escheat as provided for herein.
> "A prima facie presumption that the conveyance is made with such intent shall arise upon proof of any of the following groups of facts:
> "(a) The taking of the property in the name of a person other than the persons mentioned in section two hereof if the consideration is paid or agreed or understood to be paid by an alien mentioned in section two hereof."

There are three other distinct acts the doing of which, or any one of which, will raise the presumption mentioned. The specific grounds upon which objection is urged against said instruction is: (a) That the said presumption was intended by the Legislature to be invoked and applied exclusively in civil actions authorized by sections 7 and 8 of said act to be brought for the purpose of securing a decree escheating to the state any real property or leasehold interest in such property which has been acquired in violation of the terms of the act; (b) that said portion of section 9 is violative of that part of section 1 of article 14 of the Constitution of the United States which provides that "no state shall * * * deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws;" (c) that it is in direct contravention of the terms of article 1, par. 3, of the American-Japanese treaty of 1911; (d) that the provision as to said presumption is invalid because, when given as an instruction to a jury in a case arising under section 10 of the act, it contradicts and destroys the effect of the presumption that all persons accused of public crime are innocent until their guilt is established beyond a reasonable doubt.

(a) The statute does not expressly limit the application of the presumption to any particular action or proceeding which may, by virtue of certain of its provisions, be instituted in the superior court. Nor, as we read the statute, is there any reason arising from the statute itself or from a reasonable construction thereof which inclines us to the belief that it was the legislative intent that the presumption should have application only to civil cases or proceedings in escheat, as authorized by the act.

Section 1102 of the Penal Code provides that:

> "The rules of evidence in civil actions are applicable also to criminal actions, except as otherwise provided in this Code."

[7] We know of no other section or provision of the Penal Code whose language is such as to require the conclusion that the application of the presumption in question should not as well be applied to a criminal as a civil action authorized by the act. Hence we hold that the presumption was properly stated to the jury in the charge of the court in this case.

[8, 9] (b and c) The two propositions thus designated hereinabove may be considered together, since both involve the general contention that the presumption in question is discriminatory in its operation, in that it is applicable alone to cases in which a particular or single class or race of people is proceeded against in this state in an action in the courts of this state. But we think it will require but little reflection and no argument to satisfy any mind unfettered by prejudice against the Alien Land Law or unembarrassed by partisanship in favor of those accused under section 10 in a particular case that, in so far as it applies to criminal cases arising under the act in question, the provision of section 9 as to the conditions upon which the presumption will arise is neither amenable to the objection that it denies to any person or class of persons within this state the equal protection of the law nor subject to the criticism that it infringes any rights guaranteed to alien Japanese denizens within the state of California by article 1, par. 3, of the Treaty of 1911 between our government and Japan. The only criminal proceeding authorized by the act is that which may arise under section 10 thereof, and that section is, it will be observed, sweeping in its scope. It excepts no one from its operative effect, but by its very language is made to apply to all persons, regardless of their race, nativity, or color. If two or more American-born citizens were to conspire to do the act or acts inhibited by said section their conduct in that regard would clearly fall within the condemnation of the section. Indeed, no better illustration of the legal soundness of this proposition can be found than in the instant case, in which, as we have reason to know, one of the accused is a native of the United States. In its application to the criminal cases arising under section 10 of the act, the prima facie presumption which may arise under the conditions indicated by section 9 is, in its scope and effect, coextensive only with the scope of section 10. The presumption, therefore, as a rule of evidence, necessarily applies alike to all persons, irrespective of nativity, race, or color, who by their conduct come within the ban of section 10. It follows, then, that the rule as to the presumption is not in any wise or in any sense discriminatory as against any class or race of people or violative of any treaty rights of alien Japanese residing in this state.

The proposition decided in Re Terui, 187 Cal. 20, 200 Pac. 954, 17 A. L. R. 630, cited by the appellants, bears no relationship in a legal sense to the points here under consideration. In that case, the Supreme Court had before it the question of the constitutionality of an act of the Legislature of 1921 (St. 1921, p. 613) imposing upon and exacting from "every alien male inhabitant of this state over twenty-one years of age and under sixty years of age," except certain enumerated incompetents, the payment of an annual poll or head tax of ten dollars. Former Chief Justice Angellotti, voicing the views of the court, held, as quite obviously no other conclusion could justly be announced under such circumstances, that (quoting from the syllabi):

> "In view of the provisions of the existing treaty between the United States and Japan, providing, among other things, that the citizens or subjects of neither shall be compelled, under any pretext whatever, to pay any charges or taxes other or higher than those that are or may be paid by native citizens or subjects, the alien poll tax law of California is ineffective for any purpose with relation to any citizen of Japan."

This is all that was decided in the Terui Case, and thus readily is it to be perceived that, as stated, it has no application to or bearing upon the points here under discussion.

(d) Finally it is said, as we have seen, that the effect of embracing the presumption in an instruction addressed to a jury in a criminal action based on section 10 is to shift the burden of proof to the accused, and so nullify the effect of the rule that the presumption of innocence abides with the defendant in a criminal case until the jury, from the evidence, has been convinced of his guilt beyond all reasonable doubt.

[10] It will not be denied that, if it be within the competence of the Legislature, in the exercise of its powers under the Constitution, to establish such a rule of evidence as is involved in the prima facie presumption under consideration, a trial court may, if by so doing it does not enter upon the domain of fact, instruct the jury as a matter of law that such presumption will arise upon the proof of a certain fact or group of facts in any criminal case to which it is applicable. And we know of no constitutional restriction upon the Legislature to create or establish any rule of evidence whose effect, when applied, is not to deny to any person accused of crime a trial by due process of law. Indeed, it is in our opinion within the constitutional right of the Legislature, or of the people, in the exercise of the powers of initiative which they have reserved to themselves, to change any rule of evidence now existing, and place upon a defendant in a criminal case, of whatsoever character, a heavier burden in the trial of the charge against him than he is under the existing system required to bear.

[11] But we do not understand that the presumption referred to was intended to relieve the people of the burden of proving the guilt of persons prosecuted under section 10 of the act beyond every reasonable doubt; nor do we think when properly applied, the presumption will have that effect. It is a mere disputable presumption, the effect of which is to be overcome by such evidence only presented by the defendants as will be sufficient to create a reasonable doubt of their guilt. Its meaning is simply this: That, after the people have shown by sufficient evidence, either direct or circumstantial, that the persons charged have by their joint acts effected a transfer of farming or agricultural land to an alien ineligible to become a citizen of the United States, then it rests with those persons to explain the transaction consistently with good faith and honest intentions, or that the combination was formed with no intention to effect the wrongful result which their acts may appear upon their face to have brought about. The "burden" is neither in principle nor degree different from that imposed by the law on a person charged with the crime of murder. Section 1105 of the Penal Code provides:

> "Upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable."

[12] The above section, which obviously casts upon a defendant in a murder case the burden of a certain degree, after the homicide has been shown by the people to have been committed by him, has in innumerable cases been held to represent a perfectly valid exercise of legislative power. But by it there was no intention in the Legislature to say that the burden of proving the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt was not still upon the people, the quantum of evidence which he was required to present to support that burden being such only as would or will raise a reasonable doubt of his guilt of the crime of murder. People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 160. 164, 22 Pac. 127, 549; People v. Boling, 83 Cal. 380, 382, 23 Pac. 421; People v. Ah Gee Yung, 86 Cal. 144, 146, 24 Pac. 860; People v. Newcomer, 118 Cal. 263, 271, 50 Pac. 405; People v. Rodriguez, 182 Cal. 197, 187 Pac. 423. It should be suggested in this connection that an instruction to a jury declaring the prima facie presumption provided by section 9 of the act should always be accompanied by an instruction that the burden thus placed upon the defendants charged under section 10 of the act was only such as required the defendants to introduce evidence sufficient to create a reasonable doubt of their guilt.

[13] It is, however, clear from its charge to the jury in the instant case that the trial court did not regard the burden cast upon the defendants by the presumption in question as amounting to more than a demand upon them, in sustaining the burden, to introduce such evidence only as would create a reasonable doubt of their guilt of the offense charged. The court explicitly instructed the jury:

> That the burden of proving the guilt of the defendants was upon the people, and that "every essential fact, or every essential to a conviction, must be established beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty"; that, upon the plea entered by the defendants of not guilty to the indictment, the presumption of innocence arose, and that said presumption "accompanies the defendants throughout the trial, and goes with you in your retirement to the jury room to deliberate upon your verdict. It will avail to acquit the defendants unless it be overcome by sufficient proof of guilt. You must examine the evidence by the light of that presumption, and, unless, upon examining it, you find it sufficiently strong to overcome the presumption of innocence, to remove it, and, moreover, to satisfy you of the defendants' guilt beyond all reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty, they would be entitled to an acquittal at your hands."

Again, in another part of the charge, the court further instructed the jury that—

> "The law presumes every man to be innocent until his guilt is established beyond a reasonable doubt, and this presumption attaches at every stage of the case, and to every fact essential to a conviction."

These instructions certainly were sufficient to convey to the mind of any intelligent man or woman that the prima facie presumption arising upon a proof of certain facts in connection with the transaction culminating in the execution of the alleged conspiracy does not have the effect of attaching to the defendants any further burden than that of creating by the introduction of testimony in rebuttal of the presumption a reasonable doubt of their guilt.

The court's action in giving and refusing to give other instructions is criticized. It is not necessary to give these assignments special attention herein, for the reason that the court's charge covered every important principle pertinent to the case. Every principle embraced in the instructions proposed by the defendants, but rejected by the court, was covered by the court's charge. The criticism of certain other given instructions than the one embracing a statement of certain provisions of the Alien Land Law, and above considered, we find, upon a careful examination thereof, is without merit.

3. The court allowed the district attorney to introduce before the trial jury certain alleged statements made by the defendant Cockrill before the grand jury relating to the transaction herein involved. This testimony was limited in its effect to the defendant Cockrill. Counsel for the defendants stated that they had no objection to offer to the introduction of any portions of the statement made by Cockrill before the grand jury which involved the facts of said transaction. It transpired, however, that the alleged "statement" consisted entirely of a discussion between the district attorney, his assistant, Cockrill, and some of the grand jurors as to the meaning of the several provisions of the Alien Land Law. To these matters counsel for the defendants vigorously objected. But the court, while stating that they involved mere matters of argument as to the meaning of the law, permitted them to go into the record and before the jury, saying that they were only argumentative, and so were innocuous in their effect upon the rights of the defendants, and were so intermingled with certain facts testified to by Cockrill before the grand jury which the people were entitled to introduce before the trial jury that they could not be segregated from the facts without much waste of time and great inconvenience.

[14, 15] We have given this assignment serious consideration, and thus have not been able to persuade ourselves that the introduction of those matters before the jury exercised any baleful effect upon the rights of the accused. Of course those matters should not have been permitted to be introduced into the case, and should have been stricken from the record; but the opinions expressed by Cockrill, the district attorney, his assistant, and some of the jurors as to the meaning of the provisions of the Alien Land Law corresponded in a measure with the statement of the law by the court in its charge to the jury. Besides, the record shows that counsel on both sides, in their arguments before the jury, read and gave their respective interpretations of the provisions of said law applicable to the case. There was no expression by either the district attorney, his assistant, or any of the grand jurors contained in the alleged statement of Cockrill before the grand jury upon the question of the guilt or innocence of the defendants. Moreover, Cockrill, when asked by the district attorney or his assistant or any grand juror a question calling for his opinion as to the meaning of certain provisions of the law, invariably answered, and gave his conception of the meaning of said provisions. While these are our views with respect to the admission of the matters referred to in evidence, we are not prepared to deny that there is some force in a suggestion made by the court, when ruling upon the question of the admissibility of Cockrill's testimony before the grand jury, that the discussion of the provisions of the Alien Land Law by the parties named before the grand jury, and thus securing the opinion of Cockrill regarding certain provisions thereof, might have been construed to disclose his real state of mind with regard to the transaction—that is to say, it may well be regarded as tending to reveal in a measure his real intentions relative to that matter. In that view the discussion between Cockrill and others before the grand jury as to the meaning of certain provisions of the law would be admissible in evidence at the trial as against him.

It is lastly contended that the evidence is wholly insufficient to support the verdict, particularly as to the defendant Cockrill. We have above given herein the substance of the evidence introduced by the people and directly addressed to the proof of the charge. Laying aside, for the moment, the instruction containing the provision of the act as to the prima facie presumption arising upon the proof of certain facts or the doing of certain acts, it is clear to our minds that the evidence directly presented by the people was such that it would be an unwarranted interference with the province of the jury for a reviewing court to declare that the conclusion arrived at by the jury was not fortified by sufficient proof. In addition to the admitted facts (above referred to) that Akada furnished the money which was paid on the purchase price, and that Cockrill took the contract of sale in his name, is the testimony of the Souzas that, prior to the time at which Cockrill appeared in the transaction, Akada undertook to negotiate the purchase of the property for himself. Explicitly did B. C. Souza so testify, and further testified that he (Souza) told Akada at that time that he could not sell the land to an alien Japanese, and advised Akada to consult an attorney. It further appears from the testimony of said Souza (and this is not contradicted) that, immediately upon the execution of the contract of sale and the payments required thereby being made, Akada himself took possession of the property, although the contract was still in Cockrill's name. And here we may pause to suggest that the jury were well justified in viewing (and we may assume in support of the verdict that they did so view it) the fact of the taking possession of the land by Akada immediately upon the execution of the contract of sale as reflecting the purpose or intent of the defendants while prosecuting the negotiations for the purchase of the land; that the real intention of the defendants was to purchase the land for Akada and to take it in Cockrill's name as a mere camouflage of such intent. It also appears that no steps had been taken by Cockrill or Akada after the execution of the agreement and Akada took possession of the property to secure the appointment of a guardian for the latter's children. As stated above, Akada, in a conversation with certain parties, after the contract was executed, but prior to the execution of the conveyance of the land according to the terms of the agreement, declared that the money with which certain payments were made on the purchase price belonged to his children, the eldest of whom was about seven years of age, but could not, or at least did not, make a satisfactory explanation as to where or how they kept the money. He also stated that he was going to live on the land with the boy and "run it." Then there was the testimony of the Souzas that, prior to the execution of the agreement of sale, Cockrill said to them that he had consulted the district attorney of Sonoma county about that particular case, and that that official told him (Cockrill) that it was a valid transaction, and, as seen, the denial of the district attorney that he ever gave any such advice to Cockrill or that the latter ever consulted him about said transaction.

[16] Thus it is clear that there was sufficient evidence introduced by the people, if credited or believed by the jury, as the verdict shows that it was, to warrant a verdict of guilty as to both defendants. It is true that Cockrill's testimony tended to contradict the bad faith or any wrongful motive at the botton of the transaction which is to be implied from the testimony presented by the people. It is also true that Cockrill explained, as to the statement of the Souzas, that he said to them that he had consulted the district attorney about this particular case; that, when speaking to the Souzas of his interview with said official, he had reference, and so explained to the Souzas, to another and entirely different case. But it was obviously with the jury to accept the stories of the Souzas on all the matters as to which they testified, and reject the testimony of Cockrill as to any matters to which he testified. This they evidently did.

But, as we have seen, a prima facie presumption of guilt arose upon the uncontra dicted fact that Akada, being an alien, ineligible to become a citizen of the United States, furnished the money with which payments upon the purchase price of the land were made. If there had been no other testimony introduced after the proof or the admission of this fact—if, in other words, the defense had introduced no proof whatever or made no attempt to make a showing in rebuttal of the presumption referred to—it would have been the duty of the jury under the law to return a verdict of guilty. As we have shown, however, there is plenty of testimony in the record which strengthens and supports the presumption.

We have now given painstaking consideration to the points advanced against the validity of the judgment and the order appealed from, and, as must be apparent from the foregoing discussion, have found no just legal reason for disturbing either.

The judgment and the order are accordingly affirmed.

PEOPLE v. KNIGHT. (Cr. 968.)

Appeal and error ⚷654—Though transcript failed to contain application stating grounds of appeal as required by statute, a certified original application would be permitted.

Where the transcript on appeal did not contain the application for a complete record stating the grounds of appeal as required by Pen. Code, § 1247, but affidavits filed indicated that an application was made as required by the statute within the prescribed time and left with the deputy clerk to be filed, but subsequently lost, held, that applicant, having complied with the requirements of statute, should not be required to suffer because of the loss by the clerk, and that he might be permitted to file a certified copy of his original application.

Proceeding by the People against G. H. Knight. On motion to dismiss appeal by defendant. Motion denied.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

J. W. Wright, of Tulare, and D. M. Edwards and J. C. Thomas, both of Visalia, for defendant.

HOUSER, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal for the reason that the transcript on appeal fails to show that an application stating the grounds of the appeal was filed by the defendant as required by section 1247 of the Penal Code. That the transcript is thus defective is conceded by appellant; but after the notice to dismiss the appeal was served on the attorneys representing appellant they procured from the judge of the superior court of Tulare county, before whom the action was tried, an order nunc pro tunc permitting appellant to file with the county clerk a copy of an original application by defendant for a complete record as specified by section 1247 of the Penal Code, which application contained a specification of the grounds of appeal. Under rule 14 of the Supreme Court (176 Pac. xi) appellant has suggested a diminution of the record for the purpose of correcting the error, and has also asked for an order directing the clerk of this court to file herein a copy of his original application setting forth the various matters to the omission of which in the transcript on appeal objection is here made.

It is shown by the affidavits on file that the original application for a complete record containing a specification of the grounds of appeal was prepared within the time prescribed by the statute and left with a deputy clerk in the office of the county clerk of Tulare county, with the request that the application be filed, to which the deputy clerk responded, "'Very well,' or something of that kind;" that thereafter in pursuance of said application and on an order by the judge of the superior court of Tulare county, a complete record (with the exception of the application) was made up; that the said application has been lost or mislaid; and that diligent search in the county clerk's office and elsewhere has been made for the said application, but that it has not been found. Appellant apparently complied with the requirements of the statute, and he should not be made to suffer because of the loss by the deputy clerk of the document in question.

It is ordered that the motion to dismiss the appeal be and it is denied; and it is further ordered that the clerk of this court file with the records herein a certified copy of appellant's "application for a complete record" as the same appears on file in the office of the county clerk of Tulare county under the nunc pro tunc order of the judge of the superior court.

WORTH v. WITT et al. (Civ. 2572.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 7, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷70(2), 870(5)—Order sustaining demurrer without leave to amend is not appealable.

An order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend is not appealable, but can be reviewed only on appeal from the final judgment entered in the action.

2. Appeal and error ⚷337(2) — Subsequent judgment of dismissal held not to validate appeal from order sustaining demurrer.

An order dismissing an action entered six months after demurrer to the complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and appeal taken therefrom, does not give the appellate court jurisdiction over the appeal previously taken from the order sustaining the demurrer, especially where the notice of appeal was not from any supposed judgment of dismissal, but was from the order sustaining the demurrer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by C. Worth against Birdie V. Witt and others, to recover rent. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

J. G. Rossiter and B. M. Marble, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Edward R. Milliken, of Pasadena, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. Plaintiff brought the action to recover $2,750, which he claimed to be due for rent. Defendants owned an adjoining lot upon which were growing certain trees, the roots of which had intruded into the soil of the lot belonging to plaintiff. The latter gave notice to the former that he would demand a rent of $50 a month for the said use of his land. No attention was paid by respondents to said notice, and thereafter another notice was given that the rent would be $100 a month from a certain date. This was also ignored, and the complaint followed, based upon the theory that, by reason of said notice, and the implied acquiescence of the defendants, the relation of landlord and tenant was created. The question thus suggested is novel and interesting, but, as we read the record, we have no jurisdiction to determine it in this proceeding.

A demurrer, both general and special in its nature, was interposed, and the record shows the court sustained the demurrer without leave to amend. No other order or judgment appears in the transcript, and it is from this order that the appeal was attempted to be taken as shown by the following notice:

"Please take notice: That plaintiff above named hereby appeals to the District Court of Appeals * * * from the whole of that certain order and judgment made and entered in this action by said court on the 21st day of October, 1921, wherein and whereby said court sustained defendants' demurrer to plaintiff's complaint without leave to plaintiff to amend, and from the whole thereof."

In the written request to the clerk for the preparation of the transcript plaintiff recited also that he "desires to appeal and has appealed from ruling of this court on defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint, wherein and whereby said demurrer was sustained without leave to plaintiff to amend."

[1] That such order is not appealable is settled beyond controversy. The action of the court upon the demurrer can only be reviewed upon an appeal from the final judgment entered in the action. Wood, Curtis & Co. v. Missouri, etc., Ry. Co., 152 Cal. 344, 92 Pac. 868; Litch v. Kerns, 8 Cal. App. 747, 97 Pac. 897; Hanke v. McLaughlin, 20 Cal. App. 204, 128 Pac. 772; Pacific S. Home v. Protection Dist., 49 Cal. App. 326, 93 Pac. 169.

[2] This point was not made by respondents in their brief or on the oral argument, and hence it was deemed advisable to call the attention of the parties to the question that they might submit their views thereon. In response to the suggestion appellant has moved for a diminution of the record to show that a judgment of dismissal was actually entered. His motion has been granted, and the appropriate addition made to the record. But it is apparent that the change does not aid him in any manner. In fact, it shows clearly that his appeal was entirely premature. The clerk's certificate shows that the order of dismissal was made and entered on April 10, 1922, whereas the notice of appeal was given October 21, 1921. Of course, an appeal of October 21, 1921, could not be from a judgment of April 10, 1922. It is the claim of appellant that the clerk should have entered the order of dismissal on October 21, 1921, but, be that as it may, the fact is that he did not do so, and the statutory privilege of taking an appeal is based upon what has been done, and not upon what should have been done. It is manifestly of no moment that appellant believed that said action had been dismissed. The dismissal involved a vital fact which he must ascertain at his peril. Moreover, as we have seen, the notice of appeal was not from any supposed judgment of dismissal, but from the order sustaining the demurrer.

Having attempted to appeal from an order from which the statute gives no right of appeal, appellant's proceeding is abortive, and this court has no jurisdiction.

The appeal is dismissed.

WHITING v. WHITING. (Civ. 4166.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 9, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 5, 1923. Rehearing Denied June 5, 1923.)

Divorce ⚿133(1)—Finding of lower court against claim of desertion held sustained by evidence.

In view of Civ. Code, § 99, as to separation by consent, evidence presenting a substantial conflict as to wife's desertion held to sustain denial of divorce.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. S. Crail, Judge.

Action for divorce by Lillie L. Whiting against Perry Whiting, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint also seeking divorce. From a decree denying relief to either party, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

G. P. Adams and W. W. Orme, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Plaintiff instituted this action against the defendant to obtain a decree of divorce on the ground of cruelty. Defendant in his answer denied the charge, and filed a cross-complaint against the plaintiff, charging both cruelty and desertion. The court denied relief to either party. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and maintains that the charge of desertion set forth in his cross-complaint was fully established by the evidence in the case, and that the decree should have been in his favor on this issue. He makes no complaint as to the decree denying him a divorce on the ground of cruelty. The sole question, therefore, on this appeal, is whether, on the evidence in the case, defendant was entitled to a decree of divorce on the ground of desertion.

In support of his contention that the decree should have been in his favor defendant's counsel, in his brief, makes copious quotations from the testimony of the defendant. In fact, by far the greater portion of his brief is taken up with such quotations of testimony. He then argues that this evidence constitutes a complete case under the law of this state relative to desertion. We might agree with the defendant in this contention, and, were this the only testimony in the case, we might go farther and hold that the judgment in this case be reversed, and that the defendant be awarded a decree. But the defendant directs us only to the testimony favorable to himself, and leaves out of consideration the testimony in the case on behalf of the plaintiff. If this testimony, favorable to plaintiff, taken in connection with that on behalf of defendant, presents a substantial conflict in the evidence on the issue of desertion, then the finding of the lower court must be sustained.

Defendant alleges that plaintiff deserted him on the 6th day of December, 1918. Plaintiff admits leaving her home on the morning of that day in company with the defendant. When they arrived in the business district of the city of defendant took his grip, said good-bye, and went to his club. She was asked whether she left her husband or he left her; she replied that he left her. She further testified that she remained away three or four days, when she returned to her home, but the defendant was not there. She remained there until the day before Christmas, and during this time the defendant lived at his club, and was only at their home on one or two occasions, and then only for a short period of time. She states that it had been her custom for years to spend Christmas with her friends, the Cheneys, and that on the day before Christmas, with her daughter, Madlyn, she left her home and visted the Cheneys. She remained there a few days, when her daughter was taken with the "flu," and was sent to the hospital. The next day the plaintiff was taken with the same ailment, and also went to the hospital. On January 21, 1919, after recovering from her illness, she returned to her home. She found the house in great disorder; the defendant was not there, and evidently had not been living there during her absence. On this day she took her personal belongings with her, left the home, and has never returned there to live. On the day before, January 20, 1919, at the request of Mr. Adams, the attorney for plaintiff, the defendant called at the office of the latter, when the following conversation took place, as told by the defendant while on the stand as a witness in this case:

> "I went up there. He says, 'Is there any chance—has this gone so far that there is no chance for reconciliation?' 'Well,' I says, 'Mr. Adams, I don't believe that there is any use.' I said, 'This is the second time we have separated now.' And I says, 'She has promised, when she came back the other time, that she would never refer to the past, and it was only a week or so she got mad about something and twitted me about everything that ever happened before. She has done it half a dozen times. She has packed up her stuff partly, and I had to coax her, to coax her up, coax her up; I don't believe if she came back it would last a month or two months at the most.' I says, 'I don't believe that there is any use.'"

The testimony in the case was voluminous, and we have only referred to brief portions of it, but sufficient, we believe, to show that there is a substantial conflict therein upon the issue of desertion as presented by the allegations of defendant's cross-complaint and the plaintiff's answer thereto. The plaintiff stated positively that she did not desert the defendant, and detailed facts and circumstances which lend support to her statement. There was also introduced testimony of other witnesses which tended to corroborate the testimony of plaintiff. In the face of this record we cannot say that there was no evidence to support the finding of the court that plaintiff did not desert the defendant.

We would also call attention to the conversation set forth above between the defendant and the attorney of the plaintiff in the latter's office on January 20, 1919. This was some six weeks after the defendant claims he was deserted by the plaintiff, and while the parties were living separate and apart. He was asked by Mr. Adams, the attorney, if there was any chance for a reconciliation between himself and his wife, and he replied that there was not. He then stated that his wife had left him half a dozen times before, and he had been compelled to coax her back each time; that he did not believe if she came back it would last a month or two months at the most, and that he did not believe there was any use for them to try it again. When we remember that this testimony was given by the defendant himself, and therefore it must reveal clearly his feelings in the matter at the time of the interview, we are forced to the conclusion that the separation then existing between himself and wife was with his consent and approval. Conceding, for the present, that the wife had left the defendant, as he claimed, here was ample evidence that her leaving was with his consent. Separation by consent is not desertion. Section 99, Civ. Code. It is true in other portions of the defendant's evidence he testified that he was unwilling his wife should leave the family home, and that after she left he had repeatedly requested her to return, but such a frame of mind is absolutely inconsistent with that manifested by the defendant at the time of the interview with Mr. Adams, when he positively refused all overtures for a reconciliation, declaring substantially that he did not believe there was any use for them to try and live together again. This testimony, therefore, of the defendant himself presents a substantial conflict in the evidence on one of the essential and material elements in the case, and it alone is sufficient to support the finding of the court that plaintiff did not desert the defendant.

WHITING v. WHITING. (Civ. 4168.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 9, 1923. Rehearing Denied June 5, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 5, 1923.)

1. Divorce 🔑216, 228—Allowance of attorneys' fees and alimony to wife pending appeal held not precluded by decree denying her right to costs in action below.

In an action for divorce, where defendant filed a cross-complaint also seeking a divorce, and relief was denied to either party, and each party required to pay his own costs, from which decree defendant appealed, held, that the court, notwithstanding its previous decree denying plaintiff alimony or attorney's fees, was not precluded from making an allowance for her use in defending the appeal taken by defendant.

2. Divorce 🔑182 — Allowance of attorneys' fees and alimony held not abuse of discretion notwithstanding wife's separate estate.

In an action for divorce by a wife, who was shown to possess property valued at $4,300, and to be earning $16.50 a week, where defendant was shown to have been worth at least $200,000, held, that the court did not err in making an allowance of alimony and attorneys' fees on appeal to the wife notwithstanding her personal estate.

3. Divorce 🔑182—Allowance of attorneys' fees for use on appeal held not invalid.

An allowance of alimony and attorneys' fees to a wife for use in defending an appeal taken by the husband cannot be held invalid because of the wife's desertion where such desertion was the sole issue in the trial below which was determined adversely to the husband, and remains unreversed.

4. Contracts 🔑111—Antenuptial contract providing for payment to wife in lieu of all other claims in case of separation or divorce held void as against public policy, and not to preclude allowance of attorneys' fees in divorce action.

An antenuptial contract which provided that, in case of separation or divorce, the wife would accept a stated sum in full payment and settlement for each and every claim of any nature against the husband, including separate maintenance, allowance, alimony, or property claims, held void as against public policy, and not to preclude the court from making an allowance of alimony and attorneys' fees in an action for divorce between the parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Summerfield, Judge.

Action for divorce by Lillie L. Whiting against Perry Whiting. From an order allowing plaintiff alimony pending an appeal and attorney's fees, defendant appeals. Order affirmed.

R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

G. P. Adams and W. W. Orme, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This is an appeal from an order requiring the defendant to pay plaintiff alimony, costs, and attorneys' fees on appeal in an action for divorce. The original action was instituted by the plaintiff to secure a decree of divorce against the defendant on the ground of cruelty. The defendant, in addition to his answer denying the charge of cruelty, filed a cross-complaint against the plaintiff asking for a decree in his favor on the ground of cruelty and desertion. The action was tried, and the court denied relief to either party. It also decreed that each party pay its own costs, and denied the motion of plaintiff for alimony and attorneys' fees. The decree was entered in June, 1920, and the defendant appealed therefrom. The judgment in said action (being action No. 4166) was affirmed by opinion this day filed. 216 Pac. 91. On May 23, 1921, plaintiff moved said superior court for an order requiring defendant to pay plaintiff a reasonable sum as costs and attorneys' fees on appeal, and for alimony pending the appeal of said action by said defendant. The motion was heard by the court, and the defendant ordered to pay plaintiff the sum of $200 costs and $1,000 attorneys' fees, and the further sum of $150 per month alimony during the pendency of said appeal. It is from this last-named order that defendant has taken the present appeal.

Defendant strenuously insists that the order appealed from cannot be sustained, and enumerates the following grounds why the same should be set aside:

First, the court, at the conclusion of the trial of the action, having entered its decree that each party pay its own costs, and denying plaintiff's application for attorneys' fees and alimony, this decree was res adjudicata, and the court had no jurisdiction to grant a subsequent application for either alimony, costs, or attorneys' fees.

Second, the plaintiff had ample means of her own for her support and the costs of the action.

Third, that plaintiff had, without good cause or reason, deserted and abandoned the defendant prior to the commencement of the action, and was, without sufficient cause or reason, living separate and apart from him.

Fourth, that the antenuptial contract entered into between the parties precluded the court from making the order appealed from.

We will consider these objections in the order in which they are made.

[1] First. Was the court precluded from making the allowance for alimony, costs, and attorney's fees on account of its previous decree denying plaintiff alimony and attorneys' fees? This question must be answered in the negative. Our attention has been called to no authority supporting defendant's position. On the other hand, the exact question has been before our Supreme Court and decided adversely to defendant's contention. Gay v. Gay, 146 Cal. 237, 79 Pac. 885.

[2] Second. It is next insisted by defendant that the court erred in making said order for the reason that plaintiff had ample means of her own, both for her support and to meet the costs of said action. The recital in the order upon this phase of the controversy was as follows:

> "It further appeared to the court * * * that the defendant is a man of independent means and able to pay a sufficient sum for her support and maintenance, and her reasonable costs and attorneys' fees, and that plaintiff owns no property except an orange grove of about four (4) acres of land which has been greatly neglected, and of a value of about $8,000, but the same is incumbered by a mortgage of $3,700, and that the income from said grove is insufficient to pay the operating expenses of the same, and that she has no business or occupation, and is working in a real estate office at a salary of $16.50 per week."

While the order sets forth that the defendant is a man of independent means it does not purport to fix the value of his property, as it does the property of the plaintiff. However, in the affidavits of the parties filed on the hearing of the motion, the plaintiff gives the value of defendant's property in excess of $500,000, while defendant fixes the value at not to exceed the sum of $200,000. We think we are safe in assuming, therefore, that the defendant was possessed of property of the value of this latter figure at least, and that plaintiff's property was of the net value of approximately $4,300, without any net income therefrom, and that her only source of income was her salary of $16.50 per week. As we have heretofore seen, at the time the order was made, the defendant had already appealed to the Supreme Court from the judgment denying his divorce, and it was pending this appeal that alimony was decreed, and it was to enable plaintiff to defend herself against this appeal that the costs and attorneys' fees were ordered. Was it, under such a state of facts, within the power of the court to make the order complained of? The denial of the wife's application would have resulted in one of two situations. The defendant's appeal would have gone uncontested, or the wife would have been compelled to exhaust the small amount of property owned by her in defending herself against the proceeding instituted by defendant. It would have been unfair in the extreme to pit the wife in her penury against the husband in his affluence, in a proceeding commenced by him, and which, if successful, will not only sever the marital relation of the parties, in which the public, as well as they, have an interest, but it will cast a stigma upon the wife, against the infliction of which it was her right and duty to defend. Undoubtedly the lower court in its discretion took these facts into its consideration, and made the order accordingly. In our opinion we do not believe that this was any abuse of discretion.

In the case of Kowalsky v. Kowalsky, 145 Cal. 394, 78 Pac. 877, the Supreme Court, sustained an order of the lower court awarding temporary alimony and counsel fees where it appeared that the wife had some means, probably sufficient to have maintained her during the pendency of the action, and to have enabled her to pay her costs and attorneys' fees. In that case the court says:

> "It was within the discretion of the court to award the plaintiff temporary alimony and counsel fees, notwithstanding the fact that it appeared that the wife was the owner of some corporation stocks of the value of $700 or thereabout. The plaintiff alleged in her affidavit that the defendant owned property worth $100,000 and was in the receipt of an income of $650 per month. The defendant made no denial of this allegation further than to say that his property was not worth $100,000, and that his monthly income was not $600. This was equivalent to an admission that the value of his property and the amount of his income, respectively, were one dollar less than these sums. The court might well conclude that, with such abilities on the part of the husband, it would not be fair to the wife to compel her to sell all that she had in order to raise money wherewith to live and prosecute her action."

In our opinion the Supreme Court in this case satisfactorily answers defendant's contention that the lower court should not have made the order, for the reason that the plaintiff had ample means of her own for her support and costs.

[3] Third. The third ground upon which defendant appeals from the order is that the plaintiff deserted and abandoned him, and was at the date of the order living separate and apart from him. As stated before, defendant in his cross-complaint set up desertion as one of his grounds of divorce. The lower court found against him, and he has appealed from this judgment. The question as to whether the plaintiff deserted the defendant or not is the one question involved in that appeal. To hold in this proceeding that the plaintiff is not entitled to alimony and attorneys' fees because she deserted the defendant would be deciding that appeal in this proceeding. As the record stood at the time the order for alimony was made, the finding of the court was that the plaintiff had not deserted the defendant. Until that finding is set aside by the proper tribunal, it stands, and controls not only the parties to said action, but this court as well.

[4] Fourth. Lastly, defendant contends that the antenuptial contract, entered into between the parties precluded the court from making any order for alimony, costs, and attorneys' fees. We will not discuss the fairness or unfairness of this agreement, nor will we pass upon the question as to whether the plaintiff, prior to executing the same, sought and received proper and sufficient independent legal advice as to her rights thereunder. In view, however, of what has been said in the briefs of counsel, we are led to observe that, if there is any defect in the contract, it is the fault of defendant, and not that of the plaintiff. If the contract is cold and harsh, mercenary in spirit, and lacking in any terms of love and affection which we would expect to find in an agreement of this nature, these shortcomings must not be attributed to the plaintiff. While she had undoubtedly been consulted in a general way as to its terms, the real preparation of the document was intrusted to the defendant. He, or some one in his behalf, dictated its phraseology and selected its words from beginning to end. If any criticism, therefore, is to be indulged in relative to its contents, such criticism comes with ill grace from the lips of the defendant.

The contract in its preamble, recites that the parties thereto contemplate marriage; that they each have separate property, which they consider for the best interests of each should be defined and protected by an agreement prior to marriage, and that the consummation of the contemplated marriage is declared to be sufficient and valuable consideration for all the conditions and requirements of the agreement. The first paragraph of the contract refers wholly to the property of the parties; then follow the second, third, and fifth paragraphs (there is no fourth) in these words:

> "Second: It is further agreed by the said party of the first part hereto that in case of the separation or divorce of the parties hereto or the death of the party of the second part that in either or any of said events that the said party of the first part shall and will accept the sum of five thousand ($5,000.00) dollars in full payment and settlement for any, each and every claim of any nature or character whatsoever against the said party of the second part, his property or estate, and it is further agreed that said sum of $5,000.00 shall include in that event each and all claims for attorney's fees, separate maintenance, allowance, alimony, property claims, or any claim of any kind or character that the said party of the first part may or shall have by reason of being or having become the wife of the said party of the second part, including each and all rights of inheritance, homestead rights and widow's allowance, and upon payment or tender of said sum of $5,000.00 by the said party of the second part, his agents, heirs or legal representatives, within a reasonable time after said event or either of said events shall occur, said first party hereby agrees to and does waive each and all claims of any nature or character whatsoever against the said party of the second part or his property or estate except what he may provide for said party of the first part in his last will and testament, it being however understood and agreed that this does not and shall not constitute an agreement to leave any sum whatsoever to the said party of the first part by last will and testament.

"Third: It is further mutually agreed and understood between the parties hereto that should either party bring suit for divorce against the other at any time that they or either of them shall not ask for or accept from the court any sum or allowance or property of any kind or character not provided for in this agreement, it being mutually agreed and understood that this constitutes a settlement of each and all such claims between the parties hereto and a complete and full settlement of property rights between them; except that this agreement shall in no way affect the custody of children, issue of said marriage, and this to be valid and binding no matter what charge might be alleged or proven in any such divorce action. And should the court for any reason whatsoever grant to the said party of the first part a larger sum as alimony, costs, or attorney's fees in excess of said sum of $5,000.00, then and in that event the said party of the first part hereby agrees to waive in a legal and satisfactory manner each and all claims to anything in excess of the said $5,000.00 above mentioned.

"Fifth: It is further agreed and understood between the parties hereto that up to the present time there does not exist between the parties any mutual agreement or promise of marriage but although the same has been in contemplation the said contract of marriage has not yet been entered into but upon the signing of this agreement the said contemplated agreement and promise of marriage shall become binding each upon the other and upon the signing of these presents each of the parties hereto agrees to consummate said vows of marriage in a legal and usual manner."

From the portions of the contract above set out, it will be seen that the limit plaintiff could receive from the defendant in case of separation or divorce would be the sum of five thousand dollars, which sum would include alimony, costs and attorneys' fees. At the hearing of the motion, defendant contended that, while they were living together as husband and wife, he had advanced plaintiff money, which she had used on her own separate property, and which, together with such sums as he had paid her since the separation, far exceeded the sum of five thousand dollars, and therefore the court had no authority to compel him to make any further payments. We do not understand that it is seriously contended by the plaintiff that she has not received at least five thousand dollars from the defendant at the times and in the manner in which he claims that he advanced the same to her. The position of plaintiff is that, admitting that she has received from the defendant the sum of $5,000, as claimed by him, still the order is valid for the reason that the antenuptial contract, wherein it attempts to fix the amount which plaintiff can recover in any future divorce action as alimony, costs and attorneys' fees, is against public policy, and void.

"It is not the policy of the law to encourage divorces." Morgan v. Morgan (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 993.

"Any agreement for divorce, or any collateral bargaining promotive of it, is considered unlawful and void. * * * Under our Code either husband or wife may enter into any agreement or transaction with the other, or with any other person, respecting property, which either might if unmarried. * * * Notwithstanding this freedom to enter into any contract between themselves or with other persons, it has been held in this state repeatedly that an agreement between husband or wife founded upon consideration to withdraw or abandon a defense to a suit for divorce, or do anything to facilitate procuring the same, is illegal and void." Newman v. Freitas, 129 Cal. 283, 61 Pac. 907, 50 L. R. A. 548.

Quoting further from this case (129 Cal. on page 290, 61 Pac. on page 909 [50 L. R. A. 548]) the court says:

"The courts of other states have expressed themselves similarly in reference to such contracts."

In the case of McCahan v. McCahan, 47 Cal. App. 173, 190 Pac. 458, the parties had entered into an agreement containing the following provision:

"6. In the event that any action for divorce shall ever be instituted between the parties hereto, then and in such event it is agreed that there shall be awarded to the party of the second part the sum of one hundred ($100.00) dollars in full settlement of all her claims for counsel fees and costs herein; and it is further agreed that said sum shall be awarded in one action only."

After the execution of said agreement the husband instituted an action of divorce against the wife, who was the party of the second part in said agreement. Judgment was entered in favor of the husband, and the wife appealed from the judgment, and moved the court for costs and attorney's fees on appeal. The husband, resisting the motion, filed an affidavit in which he alleged the execution of the above-mentioned agreement and that he had fully complied therewith by paying to his wife the sum of $100. The court overruled his objection, and made an allowance of $343 as costs and counsel fees on appeal. The appellate court sustained the order, and held the contract void as against public policy. It not only held the contract void, but it sustained the order of the lower court upon the broad ground that the matter of costs and counsel fees in divorce actions had by legislative enactment been exclusively vested in the discretion of the trial court, and that any agreement made by the parties, attempting to settle such matters, is subject to the examination and sanction of the court.

In Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 103 Pac. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107, the parties had entered into an agreement which provided that, if the wife should thereafter procure a divorce against her husband, the latter would pay her the sum of $10,000 in full satisfaction of all her claims for alimony, costs, counsel fees, and her rights in the community property. The lower court declared the agreement void, and the Supreme Court, in affirming the judgment, uses the following language:

> "The real effect of the contract to pay the $10,000, so far as the husband is concerned, would be to provide against liability for a contemplated wrong to be subsequently inflicted by him upon his wife, and to liquidate such liability in advance of the commission of the wrong. The evidence and findings show that the defendant was then possessed of property worth about $77,000, was engaged in a very lucrative business, and was receiving an income of about $11,000 a year which he had every reason to believe would continue. By this contract, if valid, he was left free to inflict upon his wife the most grievous marital wrongs, such as would compel her to obtain a divorce, secure in the protection of his contract that $10,000 would satisfy all her claims against him of a pecuniary nature or in relation to the community property. If he should, after its execution, be moved by evil impulse to commit anew the offenses against his wife which first gave her cause for divorce, or other acts having the same legal effect, the existence of a valid contract of this sort could not but encourage him to yield to his baser inclinations, and inflict the injury. As it was obviously adapted to produce this result, it is to be presumed that this was one of the inducements which made him desire its execution. The law does not countenance such agreements. 'Any contract between the parties having for its object the dissolution of the marriage contract, or facilitating that result, * * * is void as contra bonos mores.'"

Our attention has not been called to any authority prescribing a different rule than that laid down in the cases above cited. The only suggestion we have received from appellant offering any reason why the doctrine enunciated in these cases should not be followed is that in the present action the contract was made prior to marriage, while those considered in the authorities above cited were made subsequent to marriage. We can see no good reason why any such distinction should be made. If contracts of this nature tend to facilitate the dissolution of the marriage relation, then they should not be sanctioned by the courts, irrespective of the time of their execution. If by such an agreement "the husband is left free to inflict upon his wife the most grievous marital wrongs, such as would compel her to obtain a divorce, and at the same time he could rest secure that the payment of the amount stipulated in the contract will satisfy all her claims against him of a pecuniary nature," would the situation of the parties be any different if the agreement had been made prior rather than subsequent to marriage? Would such a provision be any less a menace to the marriage relation if more prior rather than subsequent to its consummation? If the existence of such an agreement would "encourage the husband to yield to his baser inclinations to commit marital offenses against his wife," is there any good reason to believe that his conduct would be less reprehensible from the mere fact that the instrument, by which he had sought thus to protect himself was an antenuptial rather than a postnuptial agreement? We believe that all these questions should be answered in the negative, and that contracts like the one involved in the present action are a menace to the marriage relation, and should not be tolerated, and this irrespective of the time when the same might have been executed in reference to the time of the marriage.

We are therefore of the opinion that the contract in this action is absolutely void, and its existence furnished no ground that would preclude the court from making the order appealed from. We are further of the opinion that no good reason appears why the order appealed from should be disturbed by this court. There was no abuse of discretion on the part of the court in making the same.

The order appealed from is hereby affirmed.

PEOPLE v. KNIGHT. (Cr. 1089.)

Criminal law 🔑371(1)—Evidence of similar acts by accused relevant to show intent to commit crime charged.

Where accused admits the commission of an alleged criminal act, but denies that he intended to commit it, evidence of similar acts by him is relevant to show his intent.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

John D. Knight was convicted of committing lewd and lascivious acts on the body of a girl under 14, etc., in violation of Pen. Code, § 288, and he appeals. Affirmed.

William H. Schooler, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. Defendant was charged with having committed lewd and lascivious acts upon the body of a female child under the age of 14 years, with the intent of arousing and gratifying the lusts and passions and sexual desires of himself and such child, as denounced by section 288 of the Penal Code. He was tried and found guilty.

He had been previously convicted of the same offense, but a new trial was granted by the lower court upon the ground that it had permitted the prosecution to introduce evidence of offenses committed against other little girls, for the purpose of showing the disposition of the defendant to commit crimes of the character with which he is charged. The points here relied upon for a reversal of the judgment of conviction present practically the same question, though the evidence was received in this trial upon a different theory.

Briefly stated, the facts are as follows: Defendant at the time of the offense charged was about 57 years of age. He is the father of three adult children. He was divorced from his wife and lived alone in a small cottage in the Mission district. According to his own testimony he was very fond of little children, and his chief pleasure in life was to do things to make them happy. In the basement of his cottage he had erected a swing and slide upon which children might play, and he had also accumulated a large number of so-called funny papers for their amusement, in addition to which he maintained a piano in his home upon which he permitted little children to strum. It was his custom to visit a park in the neighborhood and to attract children by distributing his funny papers to them. He invited numerous young girls to his home, where he amused them upon the swing and slide. The prosecutrix, a little girl 9 years of age, was one of the many children who frequently visited him. At the time the alleged offense was committed she testified that she called on defendant with her little brother, that defendant on that occasion removed his clothing and put on a bath robe, and then removed her underwear and placed his private parts against hers. For this crime defendant was arrested.

When confronted by the prosecutrix with her charges and those of several other little girls, who had accused him of having placed his hands between their limbs while he was swinging them, and also at times when he was reading funny papers to them, defendant did not deny the charges in toto, but declared, according to the testimony of the police officers, that they were true in part only. At the trial and in explanation of his statement defendant testified that he did on certain occasions place his hands upon the children's legs when taking them from the swing and slide, but that his act in so doing was only accidental and done with no evil intent. To refute and negative this innocent motive and intent the state then offered, and there was received in evidence, the testimony of other little girls to show that the defendant had placed his hands under their clothing between their legs on different occasions. The reception of this evidence, it is claimed, justifies a reversal of the case.

It is the general rule that evidence of a distinct crime, unconnected with that charged in the indictment, cannot be received for the purpose of showing a greater probability that the defendant committed the offense charged. One of the fundamental provisions of the federal and state Constitutions is that an accused shall be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation. To admit evidence of such collateral facts would be to oppress the accused by trying him on charges of the nature and cause of which he has not been informed and which he has made no preparation to meet, and by prejudicing the jury against him through the assertion of an offense, the depravity of which would of necessity create prejudice in the minds of the jurors, as it would prompt a more ready belief that the defendant might have committed the act with which he is charged. Accordingly, it has been held in this state that in cases of this character it cannot be shown that a defendant has made a practice of committing lewd acts upon the persons of other children for the purpose of showing a lewd character and strengthening the probability that he committed the offense of which he is accused. People v. Anthony, 185 Cal. 152, 157, 196 Pac. 47.

Certain exceptions exist, however, to the rule just stated, which have been permitted from necessity to aid in the detection and punishment of crime. Among these is the rule that evidence of other crimes is competent to prove the specific crime charged when it tends to establish intent, the absence of mistake, or accident, or a common scheme or plan embracing the commission of two or more crimes so related to each other that proof of one tends to establish the other. Wharton's Cr. Ev. (10th Ed.) p. 73; Wigmore on Ev. § 357 et seq.; People v. Sindici, 54 Cal. App. 193, 201 Pac. 975.

We do not deem a discussion of these questions necessary, for here no attempt was made to admit the testimony objected to under any one of the exceptions. It was not until defendant claimed an innocent motive in his relations with the prosecutrix that any direct attempt was made to prove that his testimony in this respect was untrue, by showing the commission of similar acts on his part with other children. The real ground upon which the evidence was admitted was upon the theory that, after the defendant denied that the admitted acts were done with lustful intent, it was proper to rebut this declared innocent motive and intent by showing that defendant had committed like lascivious acts upon other little girls. Defendant himself opened the door for the admission of such evidence, and he is therefore in no position to complain of its reception. Where the commission of an act charged to be a crime is admitted by an accused, but he denies that he intended to commit it, evidence of his doing similar acts is relevant to show intention. Underhill on Crim. Ev. (2d Ed.) 89; People v. Hickok (Cal. App.) 204 Pac. 555.

It is claimed by respondent that defendant was not prejudiced or his substantial rights affected by the testimony, for the reason that there was sufficient evidence in the record to indicate that he had committed similar offenses, which went in without objection. The conclusion we have reached makes further discussion of the case unnecessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal and error ⚷193(9)—Appeal by defendant whose interest was subordinate to mortgage foreclosed held without merit.

In action to foreclose a mortgage on land, where, if the interest of a defendant in the property was subordinate to the mortgage, it would be foreclosed by the decree, and, if not, would not be affected by it, his appeal, in which he urges for the first time that, as he was mentioned only in the title to the complaint, and his interest in the property was not set out therein, the complaint did not state a cause of action as to him, and, not having stated such cause of action the decree based thereon should be reversed as to him, was without merit.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of Tulare county in favor of plaintiff in an action to foreclose a mortgage upon real property of defendants Brockman situated in Tulare county.

Defendant Lloyd E. Noble, appellant here, prosecutes this appeal on the judgment roll alone, and here contends for the first time that, as he is mentioned only in the title to the complaint, and his interest in the property is not set out therein, the complaint does not state a cause of action as to him, and that, not having stated facts sufficient to constitute such cause of action, the decree based thereon should be reversed as to him and the cause remanded. Appellant permitted his default to be entered against him, and now seeks for the first time on this appeal to interpose his demurrer and secure relief from the judgment. This appeal is without merit. The defendants' interest in the property is subordinate to the mortgage, and will be foreclosed by the decree, and, if not, it is not affected by it.

(L. A. 7493.)

1. Wills 🔑441—Surrounding circumstances not considered in absence of ambiguity.

Where there is no ambiguity in the phrasing of a will, the court may not consider the surrounding circumstances to determine testator's intention, but must find it in the express language used.

2. Wills 🔑296—Extrinsic evidence inadmissible to rebut presumption of revocation by testator's marriage.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1298, 1299, providing that testator's marriage revokes a will theretofore made, unless provision was made by the will or other settlement for the wife and surviving children of the marriage, or they are so mentioned as to show an intention not to make such provision, and that no other evidence to rebut the presumption of revocation may be received, extrinsic evidence is inadmissible, under sections 1307, 1318, to show whether the will was executed with testator's approaching marriage in mind and with reference to it.

3. Wills 🔑191—Appointment of one, whom testator subsequently married, as executrix, held not provision for her or indicative of intent not to make provision so as to prevent revocation of will by marriage.

A will appointing one as executrix whom testator subsequently married held not a provision for her or such mention of her as to show his intent not to make such provision, so as to prevent revocation of the will under Civ. Code, § 1299, in the absence of any thing in the will itself indicating that he contemplated matrimony when it was drawn or named her executrix with such contingency in view; the legal fees she would receive being allowed as earned, and there being nothing inconsistent in her being a legatee as well as executrix.

4. Wills 🔑220—Testator's heirs may contest.

Testator's heirs at law may contest the will.

5. Wills 🔑191—Will unqualifiedly revoked by testator's marriage, not merely as to wife.

Under Civ. Code, § 1299, a will is revoked by testator's marriage, not merely as to the wife, but unqualifiedly, if no provision is made for her or she is so mentioned as to show an intent not to make such provision, and she cannot take her portion as an heir; it being within the Legislature's power to have provided for partial revocation if it had seen fit.

Petition by Thekla T. Ryan for the probate of the will of James W. Ryan, deceased, contested by Mary N. and Maude Ryan. From a judgment denying probate, petitioner and Norton B. Anderson and another, beneficiaries, appeal. Affirmed.

J. B. McLaughlin, of Los Angeles, James H. Hull, of Platte City, Mo., and R. D. McLaughlin, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

W. W. Hindman, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This appeal is taken from a judgment denying a petition for the probate of the will of James W. Ryan, deceased, by Thekla Ryan, the petitioner, and Norton B. Anderson and Presley M. Norton, devisees under the will. Decedent's purported will reads as follows:

"City of Los Angeles, County of Los Angeles, State of California. November 14, 1921.

"This is my last will hereby revoking any instrument made prior to this date. I leave to Mable Williams the sum of $250.00. To Medora Williams the sum of $250.00. To Ellen T. Ryan one thousand dollars. To Maude Larkin fifteen hundred dollars.

"The rest of my estate both real and personal to be divided in equal parts. One-half going to Norton B. Anderson or his heirs—and the other one-half to go to Presley M. Norton or his heirs.

"It is my wish that my body be cremated.

"I appoint Thekla T. Mohr executrix of my estate without bond and Robert D. McLaughlin attorney.

"It is my wish that estate be wound up as early as possible. James W. Ryan."

On February 17, 1922, decedent was married to Thekla T. Mohr, named in the will as executrix, and on the 23rd day of the same month he died. The petition for probate was filed on March 8 following. Respondents Mary N. Ryan and Maude Ryan, two surviving sisters of decedent, neither of whom was mentioned in the will, appeared and contested the probate on the ground that the will was revoked by the decedent under section 1299 of the Civil Code, which is as follows:

> "If after making a will, the testator marries, and the wife survives the testator, the will is revoked, unless provision has been made for her by marriage contract, or unless she is provided for in the will, or in such way mentioned therein as to show an intention not to make such provision; and no other evidence to rebut the presumption of revocation must be received."

The trial court, over objection by respondents, and subject to subsequent ruling, permitted appellant Thekla Ryan to testify that she had known the decedent about ten years; that they were engaged to be married for about seven years; that they were engaged at the time decedent drew the will; that pursuant to the engagement she married him; and that at the time of making the will decedent knew of her state of health, her financial condition, and her habit of life. In its findings of fact, the court indicated its opinion that no other evidence than the will itself should be received to interpret it; that extrinsic evidence should not have been received; and that respondents' objection should have been sustained. It was further found that no provision was made for appellant Thekla Ryan by marriage contract; that she was not provided for in the will in question and was not mentioned therein in such a way as to show an intention not to make such provision. As a conclusion of law it was found that the will was revoked and not entitled to be admitted to probate.

Appellants contend that section 1299 is to be read in connection with section 1318 of the Civil Code, which provides in effect that a will is to be interpreted according to the intention of the testator, taking into view the circumstances under which it was made. It is insisted that extrinsic evidence may therefore be received to show what the testator's intention was in mentioning appellant Thekla Ryan and in appointing her executrix of the will. It is also claimed that the mention of her as such executrix is a sufficient indication from the will itself to show an intention not to revoke the will, inasmuch as, under section 1298 of the Civil Code, the mention of an heir need not be to give him a legacy to show an intention to exclude him, and that if possible the will must be interpreted in a manner which will not lead to intestacy. Lastly, appellants contend that decedent's sisters, respondents herein, are not proper persons to contest the will and that at most the will is revoked as to the wife only.

[1, 2] In considering the first of these arguments, it must be borne in mind that section 1299 is not concerned with the construction of wills, nor with the interpretation of ambiguous phrases. It refers solely to the revocation of a will by implication from the act of the testator in marrying after the making of the will. It is well settled that where there is no ambiguity in the phrasing of a will, the court may not consider the surrounding circumstances to determine what the testator's intention was, but must find it in the express language he has used. Estate of Willson, 171 Cal. 449, 153 Pac. 927; Estate of Young, 123 Cal. 337, 341, 55 Pac. 1011. In the case at bar there is no doubtful or uncertain language in the will; the entire intention of the testator as to the disposition of his property is plainly expressed. Therefore the general rules relating to the construction of ambiguities by reference to extrinsic matters are not applicable. Section 1299 expressly declares that in determining whether or not a will has been revoked in the manner there provided no other evidence than a marriage contract (Corker v. Corker, 87 Cal. 643, 25 Pac. 922) and the will itself shall be considered. The court in Sanders v. Simcich, 65 Cal. 50, 2 Pac. 741, declared that—

> "It is the policy of the law that wife and children must be provided for. Therefore the Civil Code declares that where an unmarried person has made a will, and afterwards marries, the marriage, whether followed by the birth of issue or not, operates, in case of the survival of wife, or children if any, as a revocation of the will, unless some specific provision has been made by the will itself, or by a marriage contract for the surviving wife, or by some settlement or provision for any surviving children of the marriage. (Sections 1298, 1299, supra.) The law presumes that the subsequent marriage of a testator has wrought such a change in his condition in life as to cause him to destroy or cancel a previous will, and does not admit of evidence to the contrary unless provision has been made according to law for wife and children who have survived him. (Sections 1298, 1299, supra.)" (Italics ours.)

See, also, Wood v. Corbin, 296 Ill. 129, 129 N. E. 553.

It is further settled that evidence of extrinsic matters may not be admitted to indicate the intention of a testator in omitting an heir from his will under section 1307 of the Civil Code. Estate of Stevens, 83 Cal. 322, 23 Pac. 379, 17 Am. St. Rep. 252.

In view of these considerations we are of opinion it would have been improper to go outside the language of the will itself to ascertain whether or not the will was executed by the testator with his approaching marriage in mind and with reference to it. There was therefore no error in the ruling of the court to that effect.

[3] The question is then presented whether the mention of appellant Thekla Ryan as executrix was a provision for her, or sufficiently showed an intention on the part of decedent not to make a testamentary provision and consequently prevent a revocation of the will. Nothing appears from the will itself which tends to show that decedent contemplated matrimony at the time it was drawn, or that he named appellant Thekla Ryan his executrix with that contingency in view. Her nomination as executrix, with the assurance she would receive the fees provided by law, cannot be regarded as a testamentary provision, for the theory upon which an executor is allowed fees is that he has earned them. Considering its nature and purpose, the statute as declared in Sanders v. Sincich, supra, cannot be regarded as a sufficient provision to prevent the revocation of the will.

Nor would the mere naming of appellant Thekla Ryan as executrix indicate that decedent did not intend to make some gratuitous provision for her upon his death. There would be nothing inconsistent in her acting as executrix and also being a legatee; in fact, it would be most natural in the case of husband and wife. He might have been led to name her his executrix because of his confidence in her ability and integrity, but other considerations would probably influence him in making testamentary provision for her as his wife. We cannot say it appears from this clause of the will that decedent intended not to provide for her even though she should become his wife. This view is not at variance with Estate of Kurtz (Cal. Sup.) 210 Pac. 959, for there the will expressly indicated a disposition to provide in a certain contingency for whoever should be the testator's heirs at the time of his death.

[4, 5] With reference to appellants' last points, it is sufficient to entitle respondents to contest the will that they showed themselves to be heirs at law of decedent. Estate of Land, 166 Cal. 538, 137 Pac. 246. The court found them to be such. As to the contention that the will is revoked as to the wife only, we cannot read into the statute a provision not included therein and hold the will shall be valid except as to her and that she shall be allowed to take her portion as an heir. The statute plainly says the will is revoked and the revocation is not qualified. The act of partial revocation is well recognized, and the Legislature could have provided that the will should be impliedly revoked as to the wife only had it seen fit to do so.

Lucius L. Solomons and Fred C. Peterson, both of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

WILBUR, C. J. This is an appeal from an order of the court setting aside the probate of a will. This order was entered in pursuance of the finding of a jury in a contest instituted after a probate of the will in which the contestant alleged that the will was not entirely written, signed, and dated in the handwriting of the decedent.

The proposed will is in the following words and figures:

"September 20th, 1917.

"J. N. Nelson

"To Whom this is concerned

"I leave all I have Stock Real estate and money & personal property to my cousin Ida M. Isaacs. John N. Nelson.

"Modesto, Cal.

"Stanislau Co."

The contestant claimed that all of this will was written by Ida M. Isaacs, the legatee and devisee therein, excepting the date, the signature, and what followed. That is to say that the words "To Whom this is concerned I leave all I have Stock Real estate and money & personal property to my cousin Ida M. Isaacs" were not written by the decedent.

[1] The sole question submitted to the jury was whether the entire will was in the handwriting of the decedent, and to this question the jury answered, "No." Expert witnesses having testified that in their opinion the will was not in the handwriting of the deceased, such testimony was amply sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury, notwithstanding the fact that the acquaintances of the decedent familiar with his handwriting testified that in their opinion the entire document was in the handwriting of the decedent.

The appellant bases her claim for a reversal upon certain alleged errors of the trial court in the giving and refusing of instructions.

[2] Appellant contends that the trial court erred in refusing an instruction to the effect that the testimony of expert witnesses should be received with great caution. This instruction was properly refused. Quint v. Dimond, 147 Cal. 707, 714, 82 Pac. 310; People v. Wilkins, 158 Cal. 530, 111 Pac. 612; Rolland v. Porterfield, 183 Cal. 466, 191 Pac. 913; Estate of Hess, 183 Cal. 589, 192 Pac. 35.

[3] The court correctly refused an instruction to the effect that it is the rule that the handwriting of a particular person is not always the same, and it is the rule that the same person does not always write the same style. This instruction did not state a legal proposition. An instruction was proposed by the appellant calling the attention of the jury to the right of every owner to dispose of his property by a will, and instructing the jury that if they found the will in question was made and executed by John N. Nelson "said will cannot be set aside upon allegation and proof that it was not in fact the will of John N. Nelson." This instruction, so far as it related to the issue presented to the jury, was confusing and contradictory and should not have been given.

[4] The appellant complains of the failure to give an instruction that it was the duty of the jury to determine whether or not the contestant, Stina B. Pedersen, was the aunt of the deceased. The question of whether or not the contestant was a person interested in the estate and for that reason entitled to bring the contest was one for the trial judge to determine. Estate of McKenna, 138 Cal. 439, 71 Pac. 501; Estate of Land, 166 Cal. 538, 137 Pac. 246; Estate of Mauvais, 43 Cal. App. 779, 185 Pac. 987. The issue as to whether or not the contestant was sufficiently interested in the estate to maintain the contest was expressly reserved by the court, for the jury were instructed that the sole issue presented to them was whether or not the will was entirely written, signed, and dated in the handwriting of the decedent.

[5] The appellant offered an instruction to the effect that—

> Before the jury could set aside the will on the ground it was not in the handwriting of the decedent, "the testimony should make it appear clearly, directly, and positively that the will in question is not entirely in the handwriting of John N. Nelson, deceased, and unless the weight of the testimony makes it appear to you clearly, directly, and positively that said will is not entirely in the handwriting of John N. Nelson, deceased, your verdict should be in favor of sustaining the will and against the alleged contestant, Stina B. Pedersen."

The jury were elsewhere instructed:

> "And if you are not satisfied from a preponderance of the evidence that some part of said purported will is not in the handwriting of the deceased, John N. Nelson, then you should answer said interrogatory in the affirmative."

This latter instruction that the burden of proof was upon the contestant was given by the court of its own motion. If the requested instruction to the effect that it must appear "clearly, directly, and positively that said will in question is not entirely in the handwriting of John N. Nelson, deceased," amounted to any more than the instruction already given that the burden of proof was upon the contestant, it was clearly erroneous and should not have been given. If not, it was amply covered by the instruction given by the court of its own motion.

A more serious question, however, is presented by the refusal of the court to give an instruction that there was a presumption of law that Ida M. Isaacs was not guilty of crime or wrong. This instruction was proposed in the following form:

> "The law presumes that a person is innocent of crime or wrong and this presumption of law prevails in civil as well as in criminal cases, and the jury must find in accordance with this presumption, unless it be controverted and overcome by other evidence.
> "Innocence is always presumed, and this presumption cannot be overcome except by satisfactory proof to the contrary.
> "So in this case, the presumption of law is that Ida M. Isaacs is innocent of crime or wrong, and this presumption cannot be overcome except by satisfactory proof to the contrary."

[6] The presumption of innocence is applicable in civil as well as criminal cases (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 1; Hunter v. Hunter, 111 Cal. 261, 267, 43 Pac. 756, 31 L. R. A. 411, 52 Am. St. Rep. 180; Cooper v. Spring Valley Water Co., 16 Cal. App. 23, 24, 116 Pac. 298; Wilkinson v. Standard Acc. Ins. Co., 180 Cal. 252, 180 Pac. 607. It is contended that the instruction was not pertinent to the issues in the case for the reason that there was no claim that the will was forged. The evidence of the expert witness called by the respondent was to the effect that the portion of the will claimed not to be in the handwriting of the decedent was in the handwriting of the legatee and devisee, Ida M. Isaacs. It is suggested that this, however, does not involve any crime or wrong, because if the will was signed by the decedent it made no difference who wrote the will so far as the question of forgery is concerned. The fact, however, is that Ida M. Isaacs, by permitting the will to be proposed and probated and by permitting her attorneys to represent to the court by her pleadings and by her opposition to the contest that the will was entirely in the handwriting of the decedent, is endeavoring to establish the fact that this portion of the will alleged to have been written by her was in fact written by the testator. If, as a matter of fact, the will was actually written by her, she is attempting to perpetrate a fraud upon the heirs of the deceased by proposing and seeking the benefit of a will which she herself wrote. If, in fact, she did so at the direction of the testator and was not guilty of forgery in originally writing the will, it is clear that she is guilty of wrong in attempting to uphold the document as the will of the decedent. Whether or not the crime of forgery has been committed by her is a matter which we need not determine upon this appeal, for the reason that it is clear that the presumption of innocence applies to the situation thus presented by the record.

[7] We will proceed to consider whether the failure to give the instruction requested was erroneous. The jury were instructed with reference to the burden of proof and presumption of law in favor of the validity of the will as follows:

> "If you find from the evidence that the purported will in question was admitted to probate before the filing of the petition to revoke the probate of said 'purported' will, then all presumptions are in favor of the validity of said 'purported' will and the presumption of law is that said 'purported' will is entirely in the handwriting of John N. Nelson, deceased."

This latter instruction, given at the request of the appellants, erroneously states that the admission of the will to probate created a presumption in favor of the validity of the purported will. It is true that the burden of proof is upon the contestant, but the rule is the same both before and after probate. Estate of Latour, 140 Cal. 414, 73 Pac. 1070, 74 Pac. 441; Tracy v. Muir, 151 Cal. 363, 368, 90 Pac. 832, 121 Am. St. Rep. 117. This instruction that "all presumptions are in favor of the validity of said purported will" and that "the presumption of law is that said purported will is entirely in the handwriting of John N. Nelson, deceased," seems to be more favorable to the appellants than the requested instruction that it was presumed that the will was not written by Ida M. Isaacs. (Italics ours.) However that may be, the refusal of the instruction was justified upon an entirely different ground, that is, that the requested instruction was itself erroneous in its statement of the measure of proof necessary to overcome the presumption of innocence.

The proposed instruction requires the presumption of innocence to be overcome to the "satisfaction" of the jury. The presumption of innocence in a civil case is overcome by the preponderance of the evidence. In Boa v. San Francisco-Oakland T. Rys., 182 Cal. 93, 187 Pac. 2, it was held that the court might very properly have refused an instruction which stated that the burden of proving contributory negligence was on the defendant and that it "must be established by the defendant to your satisfaction by a preponderance of the evidence, and if in your minds the evidence is evenly balanced, the defense fails in that particular." (Italics ours.) In that case we said:

> "In this case the trial court could have very properly refused to give the instruction in question, and such a ruling would have been commendable, but, having given the instruction, this court is now required to determine whether the language employed, when considered in connection with the other instructions given, was such as would probably mislead the jury to the prejudice of appellant."

In the case at bar the requested instruction did not state that the presumption of innocence must be overcome "to the jury's satisfaction by a preponderance of the evidence," but that it must be overcome to their satisfaction. (Italics ours.) We must therefore hold that there was no error in refusing this instruction, even though a correct instruction as to the presumption of innocence was proper in this case. Boa v. San Francisco-Oakland T. Rys., 182 Cal. 93, 187 Pac. 2.

STEVENS v. STORKE et al. (L. A. 6900.)

1. Libel and slander 🔑19—Newspaper article must be considered as entirety.

In determining whether, under Civ. Code, § 45, a newspaper article is libelous, it must be considered in its entirety, and may not be divided into segments and each portion treated as a separate unit.

2. Libel and slander 🔑16—Newspaper article exposing plaintiff to hatred and contempt libelous per se.

A newspaper article, the plain import of which was that plaintiff was a man of such type that the mere fact that he was supporting a particular candidate for political office should cause people to vote for some one else, tending to expose plaintiff to hatred, contempt, and obloquy was, under Civ. Code, § 45, libelous per se.

3. Libel and slander 🔑18—Newspaper article stating that plaintiff had charged county for negligible services and had put in bad roads held libelous.

A newspaper article stating that plaintiff, a contractor engaged in the business of preparing road materials, had accepted $7.50 per day from a county board of supervisors for overseeing one man who was paid $2, and that he had put in bad roads, held libelous, under Civ. Code, § 45, as tending to injure him in his business.

4. Libel and slander 🔑6(1)—Newspaper article held libelous as general attack on plaintiff's reputation.

A newspaper article referring to a libel suit wherein plaintiff had recovered damages, and stating that people wondered how plaintiff could be damaged in reputation $5,000 worth held libelous, as general attack on plaintiff's reputation.

5. Libel and slander 🔑48(1) — Newspaper may not publish false and defamatory matter concerning private citizen merely because he promotes his own political views.

While a newspaper stands in such relation to the people that, with regard to publications concerning local public officers it comes within the scope of Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3, if the matter published has the other characteristics of a privileged communication, the duty of a newspaper to the public does not justify the publication of false and defamatory matter concerning a private citizen, merely because he is active in promoting his own political views.

6. Libel and slander 🔑5—Plaintiff need not prove malice in fact, where article libelous per se and not privileged.

Where a newspaper article is libelous per se and not privileged, plaintiff need not prove malice in fact.

7. Libel and slander 🔑112(3)—Plea of truth of libelous publication held not sustained by evidence.

In an action for libel, based on the publication by defendant of a newspaper article charging plaintiff with having laid bad roads as a highway contractor, evidence held not to sustain a plea of the truth of the publication.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1050(1)—Libel and slander 🔑104(3)—Admission in evidence of prior publication in libel suit, if error, held harmless.

In an action for libel, based on the publication of a newspaper article, a prior publication by the same defendants was admissible to show actual malice if relating to plaintiff, and if the jury considered it not to refer to him its reception was harmless.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Benjamin K. Knight, Judge.

Action by E. P. Stevens against Thomas M. Storke and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ford & Bodkin, of Los Angeles, John T. McCurdy, of Santa Barbara, and Leon R. Yankwich, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

George L. Sanders, of Los Angeles, and John C. Benton, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This action was brought by plaintiff, E. P. Stevens, against defendants, Thomas M. Storke and C. A. Storke, who were respectively the publisher and editor of the Daily News and the Independent, a newspaper published in the city of Santa Barbara, to recover damages for injury to his "reputation and good name as a man and a citizen, and in his business as a contractor for the paving of streets and roads," and for mental suffering caused by the publication in the said paper of an alleged libelous article of and concerning the plaintiff. The article in question constituted a part of an editorial published in opposition to the candidacy for public office of a judge of the superior court, whose name is not material here, and is as follows:

> "Judge —— has been notorious in creeping out from under difficulties by calling in an outside judge. When there has been any matter before his court that was politically dangerous for him to try, he has called in a judge from an outside county. Take the case of Stevens v. Snow, a libel case, recently tried. The plaintiff was that same Ed. Stevens who laid down the asphalt plaster upon Chapala street. He is the same Stevens who laid the bad pavement that is found between here and the Bishop ranch. He is the same Ed. Stevens who was employed in the good old times of Conover and the old board of supervisors at $7.50 per day to oversee one man at $2 per day, and who in his testimony before the grand jury he denominated as the crew. This is the same Ed. Stevens who was indicted and acquitted by the grand jury a few years ago for some offense against the county treasury. This case was before the superior court of the county of Santa Barbara. Judge —— dodged this case, and called in a foreign judge to try the case. Some people have wondered how Ed. Stevens could be damaged in reputation five thousand dollars' worth, but the jury decided that he was. Ed. Stevens is now working zealously for the re-election of Judge ——."

It was admitted the article was published, and that it referred to the plaintiff.

Upon the trial, the court instructed the jury that the article was libelous per se and submitted to them only the issues of its truth or falsity and of the amount of damages to which plaintiff would be entitled if they should find it was false. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff and assessed the damages at $1,000. Judgment was entered for plaintiff upon the verdict, and defendants have appealed.

Appellants contend the court erred in overruling their demurrer interposed to the complaint on the ground that it failed to state a cause of action; in denying their motion for a directed verdict in their favor; in instructing the jury that the article was libelous and unprivileged; in refusing to instruct the jury that the article was privileged, and that respondent could not recover without proof of express malice; and in receiving in evidence an article previously published in their paper as tending to establish malice. It is further claimed the verdict is not supported by the evidence, in that malice in fact was not proved and in that appellants proved their allegations of the truth of the alleged libelous statements.

A determination of these questions depends primarily upon whether or not the article was in fact libelous per se, whether or not it was privileged under the circumstances, and whether or not the implied findings of the jury that the facts therein stated were false was justified.

For the purpose of their argument, appellants divide the article into four paragraphs, the first containing the statement that respondent laid the bad pavement, the second that he was employed at $7.50 per day to oversee one man at $2 per day, the third that he was indicted for an offense and acquitted, and the fourth that some people wondered how his reputation could be damaged $5,000 worth. It is insisted that there is nothing in the first paragraph which could constitute a libel, as it merely purports to say that a certain piece of public pavement laid by respondent is bad, without blaming respondent for the condition; that criticism of one's goods or of the product of one's labor is not a libel on the producer, unless such criticism imports that the person is guilty of deception; that to be libelous the words must impeach a person's knowledge or skill at his occupation, and are not such if they refer to one piece of work only. With reference to the second statement appellants contend that to accuse a person of a lawful act is never libelous, and that this statement only accuses respondent of overcharging for his work, which is a perfectly proper thing to do. Statement three is asserted not to be libelous for the reason that it states respondent was acquitted of the offense with which he was charged, and that, while it is libelous to say a person was convicted or guilty of a crime, it cannot be to say that he was acquitted. The fourth statement is claimed to be susceptible of the meaning that respondent's character is so above suspicion that the "claws of calumny cannot reach him," and it is urged that to hold that the statement, "one wondered how a man's reputation could be injured five thousand dollars' worth, is libelous, is to misconceive entirely the nature of the action of libel. * * * A verdict for plaintiff in the sum of one dollar as effectively indicates his character as a verdict for thousands." It is further insisted that the article is directed at Judge ——, that its force is directed at him, and that plaintiff's name was brought in but incidentally, merely by way of argumentative illustration. In support of these various propositions are cited many authorities.

Section 45 of the Civil Code provides:

> "Libel is a false and unprivileged publication by writing, printing, picture, effigy, or other fixed representation to the eye, which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which causes him to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation."

[1] In determining whether or not, under this definition, an article is libelous, it must be considered in its entirety. It may not be divided into segments and each portion treated as a separate unit. Van Vactor v. Walkup, 46 Cal. 124; Brewer v. Chase, 121 Mich. 526, 80 N. W. 575, 46 L. R. A. 397, 80 Am. St. Rep. 527; Graves v. Waller, 19 Conn. 90. Thus, in Bettner v. Holt, 70 Cal. 270, 11 Pac. 713, it was held that, in determining whether or not a libel was charged—

> "A court of justice is to put such construction upon the words which it contains as may be derived 'as well from the expressions used as from the whole scope and apparent object of the writer.' Spencer v. Southwick, 10 Johns. 259; Cooper v. Greely, 1 Denio, 358." (Italics ours.)

[2] The article concerning respondent in the case before us manifestly was published to disparage him; its plain import being that he was a man of such type that the mere fact he was supporting a particular candidate should cause people to vote for some one else. In our opinion the remarks were of such a nature that they may fairly be said to expose respondent to hatred, contempt, and obloquy.

Considering the statement that respondent laid the asphalt plaster and bad paving, although appellants have argued and cited cases to the point that criticism of one piece of work is not libelous—

> "disparagement of property may involve an imputation on personal character or conduct, and the question may be nice, in a particular case, whether or not the words extend so far as to be libelous. * * *" Dooling v. Budget Pub. Co., 144 Mass. 258, 10 N. E. 809, 59 Am. Rep. 83.

The quality of the pavements was not involved in the article; there was no criticism of respondent's streets as a "matter of public interest and concern," which every one might comment upon provided he did so honestly and without malice. Bearce v. Bass, 88 Me. 521, 34 Atl. 411, 51 Am. St. Rep. 446. When read in connection with the remainder of the article, it is apparent the comments were directed at respondent personally; one of the reasons advanced why his support of the judge's candidacy should lead people to vote against him being that respondent had put in the asphalt plaster and the bad pavement. The context shows the remark to be a personal attack on respondent because of the manner in which he had done the work.

In this connection, it may be stated that in our opinion the evidence does not support appellants' contention that if respondent ever was a road builder or contractor he had ceased to be one at the time the article was published, and therefore could not be injured by reflections relating to that occupation. Respondent testified that it was not true he had never bid on nor sought contracts for the paving of streets; that at the time the article was written he was contracting, not to lay roads, but to mix the material at his plant in connection with laying the roads; that he had made a bid to lay one piece of pavement as well as furnish the asphalt during the five years preceding the trial. In response to a question as to what roads he had laid as a contractor during that period he stated he had not been in the contracting business at all. It appears from the evidence that the work respondent did on the Bishop road and Chapala street was to furnish and mix the asphalt; that on Chapala street he also did certain grading. This was such work as he was still doing regularly as part of his occupation. Appellants cannot be heard to say that it constituted "laying" a pavement at the time the article was published and not at the time of the trial.

[3] With respect to the statement that respondent accepted $7.50 per day from the board of supervisors for overseeing one man who was paid $2, it may be, as argued by appellants, that such conduct on respondent's part would not actually be criminal. But it plainly indicates that he was charging the county for negligible services, which, together with the statement that he had put in the bad roads, was clearly calculated to prejudice him among the taxpayers.

[4] The last statement, that some people had wondered how respondent's reputation could be damaged $5,000 worth, is not susceptible of the construction placed upon it by appellants—that respondent's reputation was so unblemished that it could not be harmed. When it is considered with the remainder of the article it could mean only that his reputation was so poor some people wondered that it could be worth $5,000. The effect of such a statement would be to expose respondent to contempt. In their answer appellants have alleged that "the reason why the persons hereinbefore named expressed wonder and surprise how plaintiff could be damaged by said article (the one alleged to be libelous in Stevens v. Snow) was and is that said article is not libelous." But the article does not state that people wondered how the article involved in the case of Stevens v. Snow had damaged respondent $5,000 worth, but that they had wondered how he could be damaged in reputation $5,000 worth. The statement is not limited to the effect of the verdict in Stevens v. Snow, but is a general attack on respondent's reputation.

In support of their contention that the force of the publication is spent on the judge, appellants have cited Diener v. Star-Chronicle Publishing Co., 230 Mo. 613, 132 S. W. 1143, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 216. The alleged libel in that case consisted of part of an article urging the defeat of a candidate for coroner, and contained the following:

> "Isn't Coroner Jules C. Barron, present incumbent and candidate for re-election, the public official who joined with the police in letting Health Commissioner Bond's chauffeur go free, without bond or charge or investigation, after the latter had run down and killed a little child in the street, and if he is, would this be a good reason for continuing his term of service?"

The court decided the use of the word "killed" did not import a criminal killing and as one fact tending to show how strained such an interpretation would be, it was pointed out that the article was directed at the coronor, and that the plaintiff was mentioned but incidentally. In view of that fact it was held the chauffeur could not maintain an action for libel. But there is nothing to show that, had the words spoken of the chauffeur actually imported a felonious killing, they would not have been libelous merely because the article in which they were contained referred chiefly to some one else.

2. Appellants contend that the article was qualifiedly privileged, and that respondent's failure to prove malice made the privilege absolute, in that in publishing the remarks concerning him appellants were acting as interested parties, communicating matters to others who were also interested in the subject. First, it is insisted that the article referred not to respondent's private affairs, but to the manner in which he performed a public work, namely, the building of public roads, in which taxpayers were interested (citing Bearce v. Bass, supra), and, second, that by espousing and advancing the candidacy of the judge he became for the time a public man, concerning whom comments might be made under the asserted privilege, on the ground that the public at large were affected by his acts. Odgers, Libel and Slander (5th Ed.) p. 193; Flanagan v. Nicholson Pub. Co., 137 La. 588, 68 South. 964, L. R. A. 1917E, 510, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 402.

[5] In our opinion neither of these claims of privilege is justified. As pointed out above, the remarks were not intended as criticisms of the road work itself, nor were they addressed to respondent as a builder of public roads. They were directed at respondent personally. Moreover, assuming the privilege to exist in the matter of the roads, it would not extend to the statement that people wondered how respondent's reputation could be damaged $5,000 worth. Concerning the second claim, while it has been held that a newspaper stands in such relation to the people that with regard to publications concerning local public officers it comes within the scope of subdivision 3, § 47, Civil Code, if the matter published has the other characteristics of a privileged communication (Snively v. Record Publishing Co., 185 Cal. 565, 198 Pac. 1), "the duty of a newspaper to the public does not justify the publication of false and defamatory matter concerning a private citizen merely because he is active in promoting his own political views" (Newby v. Times-Mirror, 173 Cal. 387, 394, 160 Pac. 233, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 186).

[6] Inasmuch as the article was libelous per se and was not privileged, it was unnecessary for respondent to prove malice in fact (Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 116 Pac. 530; Snively v. Record Publishing Co., 185 Cal. 565, 198 Pac. 1), and we need not consider appellants' contentions on that subject.

[7] 3. In support of the claim that the plea of the truth of the publication was sustained, appellants cite Hearne v. De Young, 119 Cal. 670, 52 Pac. 150, 499, to the effect that—

> "A defendant is not required in an action of slander or libel to justify every word of the alleged defamatory matter; it is sufficient if the substance, the gist, the sting of the libelous charge be justified. Immaterial variances and defects of proof upon immaterial matters go for nothing, and, if the gist of the charge is established by the evidence, the defendant has made his case."

As proving the truth of the statement that respondent was paid $7.50 per day for overseeing one man, we are referred to the testimony of one F. F. Curry, who stated that he was a laborer employed under respondent at the La Paterra switch, where part of the work for the road to Bishop ranch was being done; that part of the time there were other persons working with him under respondent and part of the time there were not; that he thought he was working alone on December 21, 22, and 23, 1914. Respondent also testified that at that time he was working as superintendent of the asphalt plant at the switch, and that he had only F. F. Curry working there, removing an obstruction so the cars could get by. But from his testimony it appears that at about the same time he also had six or seven men working at the same place shoveling back a bulkhead which had caved in during a rain, and that he had sixteen or seventeen men working at the asphalt plant.

As demonstrating the truth of the statement concerning the value of respondent's reputation, it is pointed out that James Ross, sheriff of the county, stated that at least a dozen people wondered at the size of the verdict in the case of Stevens v. Snow, and appellants state:

> "Now, when a dozen or so people expressed surprise at the size of the verdict in plaintiff's favor in the libel action of Stevens v. Snow, which fact was brought to the attention of one of the defendants, it was legitimate for him to infer that these same people wondered how the plaintiff's reputation could be injured in that amount and to so state."

This reasoning cannot be held to justify the alleged libelous statement. As already indicated, the wonderment as reported in the article was not confined to the size of the verdict in the particular case of Stevens v. Snow, but was as to "how Ed Stevens could be damaged in reputation five thousand dollars' worth." For this reason the statement that "the jury decided he was" does not take the sting from the article. Even if the testimony referred to were the same as the remark published, it alone would not justify the publication.

> "If A. says B. is a thief, and C. publishes the statement that A. said B. was a thief, in a certain sense this would be the truth, but not in the sense that the law means. It would constitute no defense to C. for it would be but a repetition by him of a slanderous charge. His defense must consist in showing that in fact B. is a thief." Gilman v. McClatchy, 111 Cal. 606, 612, 44 Pac. 241, 242.

Appellants contend that if there is any libel in the statement that respondent laid the bad pavement, the sting is—

> "not that plaintiff physically 'laid' the Goleta road [the road to Bishop's ranch], but that the road, with the building of which plaintiff was connected, is bad. The truth of this 'sting' the defendants have established, by showing that the improper preparation and mixture of the asphalt, for which plaintiff is chiefly responsible, is the cause of the bad condition of the road."

A mass of testimony was introduced by the parties upon this issue as tending to prove whether or not respondent could be said to have laid the pavement and whether it was in fact bad. Experts were examined and extended discussions were entered into respecting the characteristics of asphalt and the various methods of preparing it for use in pavements. Appellants refer to the testimony of witnesses P. B. Jolley and Peter Irvine, who were employed in building the roads in question, and to that of A. W. Conover, who was a member of the board of supervisors when the roads were put down. According to these witnesses, respondent had charge of the heating of the asphalt for the pavements, but did not supervise the laying of it, although he often conferred with those in charge of laying it concerning the progress of the work. The witness A. W. Conover stated that he, not respondent, was responsible for the roads and that Peter Irvine was employed to oversee the entire work. Witnesses Samuel Bingham and A. S. Cooper testified that because of burned spots the Chapala pavement was not good and that there were a few such places in the Bishop road. On the other hand, respondent stated the Bishop road was a good one, and the witness P. B. Jolley stated that no burned material went into it, that the material was first class, and that the asphalt was tested by a man named Fast, a county inspector. Frank F. Flournoy, who was county engineer at the time, stated that, when the Bishop road was laid—

> "The gutters or drain ditches were all cleaned out and the material from those gutters and drain ditches was piled upon the road bed. After the winter's rain came down from the mountains through these different creeks—I think something like three or four creeks crossed this road—it filled up these gutters to a point higher than the road bed. * * * It filled up the drain ditches and left the water underneath the asphaltum, and the asphaltum would not hold up with a water-soaked foundation."

Respondent testified that apart from the two-mile section which was broken up on account of overflow water the road was good, and that the portion so broken up was good aside from the effect of the water. Both these witnesses and Charles Winters testified there was no change in the road for three or four years after it was put in, that it lasted that length of time before the damage from the water was done.

With reference to the defect in the Chapala pavement, that the asphalt was burned, respondent testified that "the city had a man to look after that proposition [the heating of the asphalt] at the plant, and he was the man that took the degrees of heat. I do not know anything about to what degrees it was het, to tell you the truth;" that "we were doing the work on that Chapala street job under two inspectors, and we tried to follow the instructions of the inspector, as much as we possibly could." From all this testimony the jury might have concluded that respondent was not to blame for the bad condition of the Bishop road, but that it was due to action of the elements, and that, assuming the asphalt on Chapala street actually was burned, the city inspectors, and not respondent, were responsible.

[8] There was no prejudicial error in admitting in evidence the prior publication of October 1st. This was offered and received in evidence for the sole purpose of proving actual malice, and its effect was carefully limited to that subject by the court in its instructions. This was a material issue in the case, because the complaint alleged actual malice and prayed for punitive damages. If the jurors were of the opinion that the publication of October 1st referred to the respondent, it was proper to be considered by them upon the question of actual malice. Scott v. Times-Mirror Co., 181 Cal. 345, 184 Pac. 672, 12 A. L. R. 1007; Earl v. Times-Mirror Co., 185 Cal. 165, 196 Pac. 57. If they were of the opinion that it did not refer to the respondent, we are unable to see how the appellants could have been harmed by its admission in evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

AMERICAN NAT. BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO v. A. G. SOMMERVILLE, Inc., et al. (S. F. 9869.)

1. Estoppel 🔑78(2)—Written acknowledgment of receipt of automobiles in conditional sales contract held not to estop purchaser from denying such receipt.

In an action by the assignee of conditional sales contracts covering automobiles, wherein defendant alleged that he had never received the automobiles, although the contract acknowledged receipt thereof, no estoppel by contract arose by reason of such acknowledgment, since it was in effect but an acknowledgment of the receipt of the consideration, which is always open to be disputed, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 2.

2. Estoppel 🔑78(2)—Purchaser of automobiles held not estopped to deny that he received them.

In an action by an assignee of conditional sales contracts, covering certain automobiles and reciting receipt of the automobiles by the purchaser, and that, if the vendor in good faith should assign the contract and moneys payable thereunder, the purchaser should be precluded from attacking the validity of the contracts for want of failure of consideration, held, that the contract did not estop the purchaser from denying that he had received the automobiles, in view of Civ. Code, § 1459, relating to the transfer of nonnegotiable written contracts for the payment of money or personal property; such a contract being nonnegotiable under section 3082, as added by St. 1917, p. 1532.

3. Bills and notes 🔑144—Parties may not impart character of negotiability to writing not negotiable under general law merchant or by statute.

Parties may not impart the character of negotiability to any writing not of itself a negotiable instrument under the general law merchant or by the statutes of the state.

4. Customs and usages 🔑8—Custom can never overcome positive statutory provision.

Custom, while often important in assisting courts to interpret statutes properly, never overcomes the positive provisions of statutes.

5. Estoppel 🔑78(1)—No estoppel by contract, unless contract valid.

There can be no estoppel by contract, unless the contract itself is valid.

6. Contracts 🔑85—Stipulations to waive want or failure of consideration may be held voidable at debtor's instance, whenever want or failure of consideration appears.

Stipulations in written contracts to waive the defense of want or failure of consideration may be held voidable at the instance of the debtor, whenever the want or failure of consideration in the inception and execution of the contract itself is made to appear.

7. Estoppel 🔑52—Doctrine of "estoppel in pais" stated.

The doctrine of "estoppel in pais" proceeds on the theory that the party has by his declarations or conduct misled another to his prejudice, so that it would be a fraud on the latter to allow the true state of facts to be proved.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Action by the American National Bank of San Francisco against A. G. Sommerville, Inc., and Richard F. Tomlinson, to recover on contracts for conditional sale of automobiles. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Tomlinson appeals. Reversed.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Goldman, Nye & Surr, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, J. The appeal in this case presents for consideration the effect of certain stipulations in executory contracts of conditional sale and purchase of automobiles. The first acknowledges the receipt by the purchaser of the articles sold, and the second purports to be a waiver by the purchaser of the defense of want or failure of consideration in the event of an assignment and transfer of the contract in good faith by the vendor. A rehearing was granted after decision and judgment (64 Cal. Dec. 393), for the reason that there seemed to be a misapprehension in the minds of the legal profession concerning the effect of the decision; this misunderstanding arising, perhaps, from the failure of the former opinion to sufficiently differentiate in the application of the doctrine of estoppel by contract and estoppel in pais to the facts of the case. On reconsideration we adhere to the conclusions arrived at upon the former hearing.

The defendant A. G. Sommerville, Inc., entered into two executory contracts of purchase and sale with the defendant and appellant Tomlinson, whereby the latter agreed to purchase from the former two automobiles with complete equipment for $3,900 each. Payment by the purchaser of the sum of $1,500 on each sale is acknowledged, and provision is made for installments thereafter to be paid. The agreements are in writing and are in the form of conditional sales contracts, providing that title to the automobiles shall remain in the seller until all payments therein provided for are made and all the conditions fully complied with by the vendee. Each of the contracts contains a stipulation, to wit, "The second party hereby acknowledges receipt of said property," referring to the automobile, and also the following provision:

> "As a part of this contract of conditional sale, it is further agreed that in the event the first party shall in good faith assign and transfer this contract, and the moneys payable thereunder, to a third party, then the second party shall be precluded from in any manner attacking the validity of this contract on the ground of fraud, duress, mistake, want of consideration, or failure of consideration, or upon any other ground, and all moneys payable under this contract by the party of the second part shall be paid to such assignee or holder without recoupment, set-off or counterclaim of any sort whatsoever."

Upon the same day they were executed A. G. Sommerville, Inc., transferred the two contracts to the American Investment Company. That corporation thereafter assigned and transferred the contracts to plaintiff, which brought this action against both parties to the agreements, alleging that none of the deferred payments had been made, and that there was due, owing and unpaid upon each of the contracts the sum of $2,400, with interest and attorney's fees. For these amounts plaintiff demanded judgment. A. G. Sommerville, Inc., failing to appear and answer the complaint, its default was entered. Defendant Tomlinson, after demurrer overruled, filed his answer to the complaint. He admitted the signing of the two executory contracts, but otherwise, and for want of information and belief, denied practically all of the averments of the complaint. As a separate and affirmative defense he alleged that he had never received either of the automobiles, and that there was a total failure of consideration for each and both of the contracts, in that defendant Sommerville, Inc., had wholly failed and refused to deliver, and that neither of the automobiles was or ever had been in existence. He further alleged that he had never received any automobiles, or anything of value, as a consideration for the execution of the contracts. By way of counterclaim, he pleaded a written agreement between himself and the Argonaut Motors Company, the obligations of which, he alleged, A. G. Sommerville, Inc., had assumed prior to the filing of plaintiff's action, and by reason of which, he asserted, that corporation to be indebted to him in the sum of $13,100.

When the cause came on for trial on the issues thus framed, stipulations were entered into between the parties as to due incorporation of the plaintiff and of A. G. Sommerville, Inc., and American Investment Company, and as to certain payments having been made to the latter by the defendant Tomlinson. Due transfer of the contracts was admitted, it being stipulated that plaintiff had accepted such assignment in good faith. Evidence of the amount of principal and interest due upon the contracts was offered and admitted, and the plaintiff rested its case. Defendant Tomlinson thereupon moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and upon the further ground that there was neither allegation nor proof of the delivery of the personal property to him or that A. G. Sommerville, Inc., had ever performed its part of the obligations imposed by the contracts. This motion was denied. Thereupon defendant Tomlinson, called as a witness in his own behalf, offered to prove that neither of the automobiles mentioned in the complaint had ever been delivered to or received by him, and, further, that nothing of value had been received by him as consideration for the making of either of the agreements. Upon the objection of the plaintiff that such evidence was incompetent and immaterial, for the reason that by the stipulations of the contracts defendant Tomlinson was precluded from interposing the defenses and counterclaims set out in his answer, the trial court excluded the proffered testimony. It also sustained plaintiff's objection to all evidence offered in support of the counterclaim alleged to exist against A. G. Sommerville, Inc.

The trial court found the due execution and assignment of the contracts for the purchase of the automobiles, and the existence in said agreements of the stipulations acknowledging receipt of the property and the purported waiver of defenses in the event of an assignment in good faith. It further found that, by reason of the acknowledgment of defendant Tomlinson to the vendor to the receipt of the automobiles, contained in the contracts, a prima facie case of delivery had been made, and that evidence of want of consideration for the contracts, or of failure of consideration therefor, was incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, and wholly inadmissible, by reason of the agreement of Tomlinson, contained in the waiver clause of the contract, by which he was precluded from raising any such defense or from asserting any counterclaim as against this plaintiff. "Because of such admission of receipt for said car in the contract, and because of the legal inability of the defendant to introduce evidence attacking such receipt, or raising a defense of want or failure of consideration" (such is the language of the decision), the court found that A. G. Sommerville, Inc., had performed all the terms and conditions imposed upon it by the contracts in favor of defendant Tomlinson. Judgment was accordingly entered in favor of plaintiff for the unpaid principal of the two contracts, together with interest and attorney's fees, amounting in the aggregate to $4,365, in addition to plaintiff's costs. It is from this judgment that the defendant Tomlinson has taken and prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The question presented for consideration is whether or not the trial court was in error in refusing to permit the defendant Tomlinson to introduce testimony tending to prove that the personal property described in the contracts of conditional sale had never been delivered to him, and that there was, therefore, a total want or failure of consideration for the agreements. The question, reduced to its simplest form of statement, is this: Was the defendant Tomlinson estopped by the stipulations in his contract to show by proper evidence as against this plaintiff that the consideration for the contracts had failed? Were we dealing alone with the acknowledgment by the vendee of the receipt of the automobiles, we might consider it to be now well settled in this state that no estoppel by contract arose by reason of such acknowledgment, since the acknowledgment of the receipt of the articles is in effect but an acknowledgment of the receipt of the consideration received by the defendant for the contract, and it is always open to a party to dispute such recital. Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 2; Parker v. Funk, 185 Cal. 347, 352, 197 Pac. 83; Ashley v. Vischer, 24 Cal. 322, 326, 85 Am. Dec. 65. In Parker v. Funk, supra, it was distinctly held by this court that the acknowledgment by a vendee under a conditional contract of sale of the receipt of the subject-matter of the sale was in effect but an acknowledgment of the receipt of consideration for such sale, and that it was open to dispute by the vendee against the vendor or his assignee by showing against either that there was no consideration or that the consideration had failed. It would seem to follow in this case, as in that, that no estoppel by contract arose by reason of the acknowledgment of the receipt of the automobiles which would suffice lawfully to preclude the defendant Tomlinson from proving that, through the nondelivery to him of the personal property covered by the contracts, consideration therefor had wholly failed.

[2] Nor do we think that the right of defendant Tomlinson to have made this proof was impaired, in so far as an estoppel by contract is concerned, by the further stipulation in the contract to the effect that, in the event the vendor in good faith assigned and transferred the contract and the moneys payable thereunder to a third party, the vendee should be precluded from attacking the validity of the contracts for want or failure of consideration. To give such effect to the provision in the contracts would practically be to nullify the general rule relating to the assignment of nonnegotiable instruments embodied in section 1459 of the Civil Code, which provides that:

> "A nonnegotiable written contract for the payment of money or personal property may be transferred by indorsement, in like manner with negotiable instruments. Such indorsement shall transfer all the rights of the assignor under the instrument to the assignee, subject to all equities and defenses existing in favor of the maker at the time of the indorsement."

This section not only fails to confer upon nonnegotiable instruments the immunity which belongs to negotiable paper, but expressly withholds it, and saves to the defendant in an action brought by an assignee any defense which he might have had against the assignor before the assignment of notice thereof. To give countenance to respondent's contention would, in effect, be permitting parties to contracts to create a new form of negotiable instruments.

[3] Conditional contracts of sale are nonnegotiable instruments in this state. Civ. Code, § 3082 (as added by St. 1917, p. 1532). Parties may not impart the character of negotiability to any other writing not of itself a negotiable instrument under the general law merchant or by the statutes of the state. The character of such an instrument as being negotiable or otherwise must appear not by force of the mere stipulation of the parties that it shall be such, but must be implied by law as the result of the form and effect of the instrument itself. See Witte v. Vincenot, 43 Cal. 325, 329–331. Counsel in the brief of amicus curiæ urge upon our consideration the fact that large sums of money are "now invested by banks and other financial institutions in this state in automobile paper similar to that here involved," and that "a very material element of inducement to engage in this business is the safety afforded, or as was thought to have been afforded by the particular provisions here in question, without which provisions, regarded as quite essential in the transaction of this particular business, the continuance of the same would certainly be less attractive." This is, in effect, but a restatement of the argument made in Kohn v. Sacramento Elec., Gas & Ry. Co., 168 Cal. 1, 7, 141 Pac. 626, to the effect that, bonds having been so long treated as negotiable instruments, the courts should respect the custom of the country and make the letter of the statutes bend to it. We make the same answer:

> "Custom is often very important, it is true, in assisting courts to interpret statutes properly, but it never overcomes the positive provisions of statutes."

[4] While the precise question of the validity or invalidity of stipulations foreclosing the right of a party to an instrument otherwise nonnegotiable from setting up the defense of failure or want of consideration in an action brought upon the contract has not heretofore been passed upon by this court, there are certain well-defined rules of law in respect to situations so nearly analogous as to be of persuasive force in directing our conclusions in the instant case. The nonenforcement of illegal contracts, such being a matter of public interest, has received much attention from the courts, and it has been universally held that a party to such an agreement may not, either by stipulation at the time of the execution thereof, or afterwards, waive his right to urge the illegality in any action thereon instituted by the other party thereto. The same rule of public policy which forbids the execution of the contract forbids the giving of a quasi-validity thereto by the waiver of such defense. 15 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 1014. Whenever the illegality appears, the disclosure is fatal to the case. No consent of the defendant can neutralize its effect. A stipulation in the most solemn form to waive the objection is tainted with the vice of the original contract, and void for the same reason. Coppell v. Hall, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 542, 558, 19 L. Ed. 224; Faircloth v. De Leon, 81 Ga. 158, 161, 7 S. E. 640; Shenk v. Phelps, 6 Ill. App. 612; Braxton v. Liddon, 49 Fla. 280, 289, 38 South. 717; Fay v. Ind. Lbr. Co., 178 Ala. 166, 168, 59 South. 470; Wilcox v. Howell, 44 N. Y. 398, 402; Bridger v. Goldsmith, 143 N. Y. 424, 38 N. E. 458. In other words, there can be no estoppel by contract unless the contract itself is valid.

[5, 6] While some of the foregoing cases refer to fraud in the inception or execution of contracts, the fact remains that fraud in the creation of a contract does not render the instrument more vulnerable than does want or failure of consideration, which renders every agreement voidable and incapable of enforcement (Gamble v. Tripp, 99 Cal. 223, 226, 33 Pac. 851; Wheat v. Bank of California, 119 Cal. 4, 6, 50 Pac. 842, 51 Pac. 47), and this defense is available even as against the assignee of the contract (Crawfis v. Edwards, 178 Cal. 805, 175 Pac. 410; Briggs v. Crawford, 162 Cal. 124, 129, 121 Pac. 381). Following the analogy of the fraud cases, we see no reason why stipulations to waive the defense of want or failure of consideration may not be held voidable at the instance of the debtor, whenever the want or failure of consideration in the inception and execution of the contract itself is made to appear. If such stipulations be regarded as collateral agreements, in a sense ancillary to the main contract, under such circumstances there would appear to be no consideration whatever to support them. On the other hand, if they be regarded as an essential part of the main contract, they would have to find support in the same consideration which sustains the main contract. When that consideration fails, the particular covenant must be held to have fallen with it. The respondent has cited, and strongly relies upon, the case of Anglo California Trust Co. v. Hall (Utah) 211 Pac. 991, as upholding its contention. The question there considered was whether or not a party could in his contract waive, as against the assignee, a breach of warranty. The court held that in the absence of fraud or duress it might be done. Some general language in the opinion in that case, which might be given application to a waiver by contract of the defense of want or failure of consideration, amounts to dicta, and is not consonant with our views.

[7] We conclude, therefore, that, if an estoppel against the defendant Tomlinson exists in this case, it must be one arising in pais, which is a very different thing from an estoppel by contract, and by means of which a party to a contract may well be held to be estopped from denying the validity of the instrument which, if it were not for such estoppel, would undoubtedly be held to be invalid. The doctrine of estoppel in pais proceeds upon the theory that the party has, by his declarations or conduct, misled another to his prejudice, so that it would be a fraud upon the latter to allow the true state of facts to be proved. The representation must be one intended by the party making it to be acted upon by the other, or made under such circumstances that the other had the right to believe that it was so intended. Otherwise there is no fraud or anything in the nature of fraud. Parker v. Funk, supra. There is no doubt that, upon a proper showing being made, a party to a contract will be estopped from setting up, as against an assignee of the other party to the contract, either that there was no consideration or that there was a total or partial failure of consideration. If, for example, in this case it had appeared that plaintiff, before purchasing the contracts of sale, had inquired of defendant Tomlinson whether or not the latter had actually received the automobiles, saying that it was thinking of purchasing the contracts, and Tomlinson replied that he had received the machines, and if, in reliance upon such representations, plaintiff had then purchased the contracts, there could be no question, we take it, that Tomlinson would not now be permitted to rely upon the defense that he had never received the automobiles. It makes no particular difference how the representation by the vendee, which was acted upon by the assignee, was made; the essential thing being that it was made for the purpose of being acted upon, and that it was acted upon. Such a representation no doubt can be, and frequently is, made in the contract itself, and is made there for the purpose of assurance to any one considering the purchase of the contract.

In such a case, if one purchases in reliance upon this assurance, the other party to the contract, in this case, for example, the vendee of the automobiles, is estopped from denying that he actually received the machines which constituted the consideration for the contract. Such an estoppel, although it relates to a contract, is an estoppel in pais. It is an application of the fundamental, equitable, and moral rule that a man may not be permitted to deny the truthfulness of an assurance which he has given to another, for the purpose of having it acted upon by the latter, and which the latter has acted upon. As was said in Parker v. Funk, supra:

> "It is, of course, not difficult to imagine a case where a recital is put into a contract for the very purpose of having it acted on. For example, conditional sales contracts of automobiles are largely dealt in by way of sale and assignment, and if it appeared in the present case that the defendant had acknowledged the receipt of the subject of the sale prior to his actually having received it, in order that his vendor might the more easily realize upon the contract, or even under circumstances such that he should have known that some one in reliance upon the recital would not improbably purchase the contract as one for the sale of a completed and delivered article, he would undoubtedly be estopped from showing the contrary. Fugate v. Hansford's Ex'rs, 3 Litt. (Ky.) 262; National, etc., Co. v. Sherwood, 165 Cal. 1, 130 Pac. 881."

It is not at all impossible that such was the fact in this instance, but, if it were, it devolved upon plaintiff to prove it. Parker v. Funk, supra. That was all that was necessary to be done to entitle plaintiff to recover. It had established a prima facie case, subject to having its cause of action defeated by the proof which the defendant Tomlinson offered, and which he should have been permitted to introduce, regardless of whether or not such proof conformed or did not conform to the face of the contracts. Plaintiff in rebuttal would have had full opportunity to show that the acknowledgment of the receipt of the automobiles, and the waiver of the defense of want or failure of consideration, were inserted in the contracts under such circumstances as to permit it to invoke the doctrine of estoppel in pais. All these facts were open to investigation, and upon a full inquiry the court could have readily determined the question. Rauer v. Fay, 110 Cal. 361, 368, 42 Pac. 902. It follows, therefore, that the trial court was in error in refusing to permit the introduction of the testimony offered by the defendant Tomlinson in support of his defense of want or failure of consideration.

The offer of the defendant Tomlinson to support his alleged counterclaim against the defendant A. G. Sommerville, Inc., presented an immaterial issue in the present case. If he should be successful in establishing a want or failure of consideration for the contracts, the action fails. If, on the other hand, he is estopped in some way to deny the effect of the clause waiving certain defenses, recoupment, set-off, or counterclaim in the event of an assignment in good faith, he is bound by his stipulations.

NORTON v. ROSENKRANZ et al.

(Civ. 4481.)

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑123—Finding that building did not conform to contract sustained by evidence.

Evidence in action by purchaser to rescind an executory contract of sale of real estate, providing for the erection of a bungalow on the land by the vendor, held to sustain finding that the building erected did not conform to the contract.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑116—Purchaser need not surrender executory contract before action to rescind.

Under Civ. Code, § 1691, providing that a party to rescind a contract must restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract, the purchaser under an executory contract for sale of land on which he has made payments need not, before suing to rescind, surrender or offer to surrender the contract.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑123—Evidence sustained finding that purchaser had no possession to surrender.

In action by purchaser to rescind, evidence held to sustain finding that he had no possession, as respects his duty to surrender possession before suing, notwithstanding his permitted planting of trees and housing of an automobile on the premises in a garage.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑107—Purchaser suing to rescind not in default though failing to make payment after concluding not to accept.

As respects purchaser's right to rescind contract to purchase land with a building to be erected thereon by the vendor, purchaser held not in default, though he failed to make payment which became due after he concluded not to accept the building because of defects.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Margaret Norton against Elias V. Rosenkranz and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. V. Rosenkranz, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

W. H. Thomas, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action to rescind an executory contract of sale of certain real property upon the ground of fraud. The trial court found on all the material issues in favor of plaintiff, declared the agreement void, and rendered judgment in her favor in the sum of $1,748.78. Motion for a new trial was made and denied. This is an appeal from the judgment. Defendant Firth having died during the pendency of the action, Elias V. Rosenkranz and Title Insurance & Trust Company have by stipulation been substituted as defendants in his place and stead.

The facts as recited in the amended complaint show, in substance, that plaintiff entered into an agreement with defendant Firth for the purchase of certain real property situated in Los Angeles county. The property consisted of two lots in a particular tract. The contract price of one of the lots was $800 and that of the other $825. In the performance of her contract and up to a period of time hereinafter referred to plaintiff paid for one of the lots in full, and there was due and owing upon the other the sum of $471.25. On the 31st day of August, 1920, negotiations were had between the parties looking to the improvement of the lots. Defendant, who was a builder, represented to plaintiff that it would be a good investment for her to erect a bungalow upon the property, and he offered to cancel her contracts in relation to the same and to construct the bungalow on payment of the further sum of $6,791.28, the amount to be paid in certain installments commencing September 30, 1920, and during the progress of the work. Plaintiff consented to this arrangement, her contracts were canceled, and a new agreement was thereupon entered into between the parties, by the terms of which defendant agreed to erect a seven-room bungalow according to certain plans and specifications, and in a first-class manner. This contract is silent as to the time when the bungalow was to be finished, plaintiff, however, alleging that by oral agreement completion was to be had by December of the same year. It is charged that, while this period for construction was a reasonable time to insure the completion of the structure, defendant failed to complete the same until March of the following year, and that when so completed the building did not comply with the plans and specifications in many particulars, the alleged defects being set forth in detail in the complaint. It is further charged that the promises of defendant in relation to the manner in which the building was to be constructed were all and each of them false, and made with the intent to deceive plaintiff into entering into the agreement whereby she transferred her interest in the real property above mentioned to defendant. Then follow allegations of the giving notice of rescission and other matters, a recital of which is unnecessary for the purpose of the decision.

The prayer of the complaint asks that the contract be delivered up and canceled, and that plaintiff recover the sum of $2,500, the amount it is alleged she paid under the different contracts.

Defendant, answering, admitted that the structure as completed was not a first-class job, but by way of defense he alleged that this result was due to general conditions prevailing in the vicinity at the time of the performance of the contract which affected labor and materials, and that the structure as completed substantially complied with the terms of the contract. He further alleged that plaintiff was in default both before and at the time of her rescission, and was therefore in no position to claim the relief here sought. He also alleged as a further reason against the maintenance of the action that prior to her rescission plaintiff accepted the building and went into possession, and that she has never returned or offered to return such possession or any of the benefits received by her under the contract.

The case was tried without a jury. The court found, in substance, that the building was improperly constructed, and that plaintiff had rescinded the contract, which it found to be void and of no force or effect. It further found that plaintiff never went into possession of the premises, and that her allegation that she had received no benefits under the contract was true. As above recited, a money judgment was thereupon rendered in her favor in the sum of $1,748.78, the amount found to have been paid by her to the defendant under her agreement up to the time when she concluded that the building was not being properly erected, and when she concluded not to accept it.

[1] Among the grounds relied upon for a reversal is the claim that the evidence does not support the finding that the building did not conform to the terms of the contract. Upon this subject there is testimony to show that it was erected in a very poor and imperfect manner, contrary to the plans and specifications and in violation of the provisions of the Dwelling House Act. The doors were short, and to remedy this defect they had to be spliced so as to be made to fit; the roof had spread by reason of the settling of its supports and from insufficient bracing, and one side of the building was bulged out; the windows and roof leaked; the plastering cracked on account of the sinking of the archway, and the windows and sills were out of alinement. Experts testified to many other defects.

This evidence is sufficient to warrant the finding, as expressed by the trial judge who viewed the premises, that it was, in the language of one of the experts, "the rottenest job of carpentry and building that he had ever seen." There is therefore no merit in the contention that the evidence fails to support the findings in this particular.

[2] It is next claimed that the evidence fails to show that the plaintiff ever accomplished a rescission of the contract, for the reason that she never restored or offered to restore the things of value she had received under the contract, as required by section 1691 of the Civil Code. The rule announced by this section is based upon the principle that he who seeks equity must do equity. In this connection it is well settled that any person demanding a rescission of a contract to which he is a party must restore or offer to restore to the other whatever he may have received under the contract in the way of money, property or other consideration of benefit. It is only by doing this that he can entitle himself to the return of what he, on his part, may have given or paid, and to be released from the contract. Such, in effect, are the requirements of the section above referred to. Restoration to the status quo ante, however, is not essential in all instances. There are situations where the party who seeks to rescind has received nothing of value, and under such circumstances, as there is nothing to restore, the rule does not apply. Larkin v. Mullen, 128 Cal. 449, 60 Pac. 1091; Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 Pac. 1011. In the instant case one of the things that it is claimed plaintiff received under the contract was the muniment of title evidenced by the executory contract here sought to be rescinded. It is admitted that plaintiff failed to tender a return of this instrument. In her complaint she sets forth that she received nothing, and the court so found.

This contention presents the question whether or not under the circumstances of the case plaintiff was bound to surrender or offer to surrender her executory contract of sale to defendant before being entitled to rescind. In support of this claim it is in substance argued that plaintiff, by virtue of her contract, received an equitable title in and a lien upon the property, and the only means by which she could restore the defendant to his original status was by giving or tendering him a return of this instrument or a quitclaim deed relinquishing her interest, and that such tender was a condition precedent to her right of recovery.

We see no merit in this contention. One seeking the rescission of a contract is not required to make a tender or offer of restoration of that which he would be entitled in any event to retain. Here plaintiff had conveyed to defendant her interest in the lots acquired by her under her original contract with defendant, and she was entitled to retain her contract evidencing this interest for her own protection in the event that rescission should be denied her. 2 Black on Rescission and Cancellation, § 621. It is not claimed that any sale was effected under the executory agreement, as the contract provided that a conveyance was to be made only upon full performance; but, even conceding, for the purpose of the case, that the outstanding unrecorded executory agreement constituted a cloud upon the title to the property, and was therefore a thing of value within the meaning of the Code section, it was an interest which plaintiff had acquired, and one she was entitled to retain by reason of her payments, and until a determination of her rights was had she was not bound to relinquish this evidence of interest.

In conformity with this view it has been held that, where a plaintiff was seised in fee of two pieces of land, and was induced by fraudulent representations as to his title to relinquish one piece in consideration of a deed to the other, in order to maintain an action to set aside his conveyance of the one piece upon discovery of the fraud, it was not necessary to restore the other so as to put the parties in statu quo. Du Pont v. Du Bos, 52 S. C. 244, 29 S. E. 665. See, also, Matteson v. Wagoner, 147 Cal. 739, 82 Pac. 436; Wills v. Porter, 132 Cal. 516, 64 Pac. 896; 2 Black on Rescission, p. 1432.

The court had under the pleadings power to do exact justice between the parties and place them both in statu quo by adjudging their rights in and to the property, and its judgment determines such rights, and is res adjudicata upon the subject. This is all that plaintiff sought by her action. Wills v. Porter, supra; Schneider v. Schneider, 125 Iowa, 1, 98 N. W. 159.

[3] In this connection it is further contended that plaintiff had possession and use of the premises both before and after the attempted rescission. The court found otherwise. The evidence upon the subject sustains the finding. It in effect shows that plaintiff during the construction of the bungalow lived on adjoining property, and that she housed her automobile in a garage built and located on the back portions of the lots in question, but that the occupation of the garage was not intended to constitute possession in her, but that, on the contrary, it was understood by the parties to be a mere accommodation. It further shows that, while plaintiff also planted certain trees in anticipation of her acquirement of the premises, this act was also done under a privilege, and was not intended by the parties as one indicating possession. Under the contract and pending performance thereof plaintiff had no right to possession of the property (Havens v. Alameda County, 30 Cal. App. 206, 157 Pac. 821); and, as the court found, she acquired none by her agreement.

[4] And, finally, it is claimed that plaintiff was in default in her payments. The bungalow was completed in March, 1921, and possession was tendered plaintiff. It is true that at this time she had not made her February payment, but the evidence shows that prior to this time she had concluded not to accept the building for the reasons heretofore stated. Under such circumstances she was entitled to withhold further payments.

No other questions are presented.

GENERAL MOTORS ACCEPTANCE CORPORATION v. CODIGA. (Civ. 4443.)

1. Contracts 🔑127(4) — Parties to litigation may not stipulate away jurisdiction of any court.

A stipulation by the parties to an action as to the place of trial has no force or effect, unless the trial court sees fit to make an order changing the place of trial in accordance with such stipulation.

2. Judgment 🔑45—Provision of note providing for confession of judgment by maker's attorney held invalid.

A stipulation in a note authorizing, irrevocably, any attorney at law to appear for the maker in any court of record in the United States and waive the issue and service of process and confess judgment in favor of the holder for such amount as may appear to be unpaid, together with the costs, violates Code Civ. Proc. § 1133, setting out the requirements of the statement in writing and the form thereof in confessions of judgment.

3. Venue 🔑17—Covenants in note held not to waive venue.

The provisions in a note authorizing any attorney at law to appear for the maker in any court of record in the United States, waive the issue and service of process, and confess judgment, and providing for an attorney's fee in case of enforced collection, and waiving all benefits of valuation, appraisement, and exemption, laws and rights of appeal, releasing all errors, held not to authorize plaintiff to bring an action thereon in any court of competent jurisdiction.

4. Contracts 🔑153 — Courts not inclined to strain construction of invalid contract to place an interpretation not written therein.

Courts are not inclined to go out of their way, when confronted with an invalid covenant, to search for ways and means of saving something from the wreck and thus placing an interpretation upon the contract which the parties never wrote therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by the General Motors Acceptance Corporation against Joseph Codiga. From an order denying a change of venue, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Nutter, Hancock & Rutherford, of Stockton, and Frank R. Wehe and C. S. Morbio, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Haswell & Pierce, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendant was sued on a promissory note, and at the time that he appeared in the action he filed a demurrer and moved to change the place of trial of the action from the superior court of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, to the superior court in and for the county of San Joaquin. His motion was denied, and the defendant has appealed.

The record does not disclose any points with reference to the form of any paper, nor any question as to procedure, except as to the following matters. In its complaint the plaintiff pleaded an action on a promissory note, and in doing so it set forth a complete copy of the note and the indorsements thereon. In its reply to the defendant's moving papers, the plaintiff filed a counter affidavit in which it set forth certain of the covenants contained in the note, and thereupon it based its contention—

> "That by reason of such right, as provided for in said note, plaintiff corporation as the holder in due course of said note has brought the action hereinabove referred to in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco."

If the passages contained in the promissory note sustained the plaintiff's position, then the judgment should be affirmed, otherwise it should be reversed. Those passages, in so far as they are pertinent to the question before this court, are as follows:

> "And I (we) hereby authorize, irrevocably, any attorney at law, to appear for me (us) in any court of record in the United States and waive the issue and service of process and confess a judgment against me (us) in favor of the holder hereof, for such amount as may appear to be unpaid hereon, together with costs.
> "And I (we) agree, in the event this note be placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, to pay 15 per cent. of the amount due hereon as attorneys' fees.
> "And I (we) hereby agree to waive all benefits of valuation, appraisement and exemption laws, and all rights of appeal, and to release all errors."

The respondent at once claims that the language "in any court of record of the United States" for manifest reasons should be construed as though it were written in any superior court of the state of California, and thereupon the respondent contends that the covenants quoted entitle the respondent to claim that—

> "'The greater' (right to judgment against defendant by confession in any court of competent jurisdiction) includes 'the less' (the right to the trial of an action on such cause in any court of competent jurisdiction)."

To support it in this contention, the respondent cites and relies on State ex rel. Schwabacher Co. v. Superior Court, 61 Wash. 681, 112 Pac. 927, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 814. The case does not support the claim. In the Schwabacher Case the contract before the court contained a passage as follows:

> "And in case suit be brought to collect this note or any part thereof * * * the maker agrees that the venue of said suit or action, may be laid in King county, Washington."

Furthermore, section 216, Rem. & Bal. Code, of the state of Washington, provides:

> "Notwithstanding the provisions of section 209, all the parties to the action by stipulation in writing * * * may agree that the place of trial be changed to any county of the state, and thereupon the court must order the change agreed upon."

[1] In California we have no such statute; but, in the event that the parties stipulate, their stipulation will have no force or effect unless the trial court sees fit to make an order changing the place of trial in accordance with the stipulation of the parties. In other words, in California, parties to litigation may not as of right stipulate away the jurisdiction of any court. In the second place, the covenant contained in the instrument before the court in the Schwabacher Case contained language that is quite different from the language contained in the note which was the subject-matter of this suit. The respondent does not claim that the courts have any power to make contracts for the parties, but the respondent has cited many authorities and has made many arguments to the effect that the covenant contained in the note in suit should be given the same construction as the covenant contained in the note involved in the Schwabacher Case. It will serve no purpose for us to answer each one of those arguments. It is patent from a most cursory reading of the covenants which we have quoted above that the covenants do not singly or collectively speak on the subject of the place of trial.

[2-4] The first covenant authorizes any attorney at law to appear and confess judgment; the second covenant provides for the allowance and the amount of an attorney fee; and the third covenant waives numerous rights, but does not even purport to mention a motion to change the venue. Counsel do not claim that either of the two latter elements is involved in this appeal. The first element is invalid because it is in violation of section 1133 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The respondent does not even claim that it is a valid covenant within the provisions of our Code, but contends that it is so broad as to support the respondent's position in this case. With this claim we cannot agree. It is not so written on the face of the paper, and, with reference to contracts such as the one before the court, courts are not inclined to go out of their way, when confronted with an invalid covenant, to search for ways and means of saving perchance something from the wreck and thus placing an interpretation on the contract which the parties never wrote therein. Borderre v. Den, 106 Cal. 594, 600, 39 Pac. 946. A similar contention was made to the Supreme Court of Washington. Kanaskat Lumber & Shingle Co. v. Cascade Timber Co., 80 Wash. 561, 142 Pac. 15. To that contention the court replied as follows:

> "The duty of courts when construing questioned contracts to search out the intention of the parties is well established, but that duty arises out of an ambiguity or omission that demands the reception of testimony to illustrate their meaning, or to harmonize apparent conflict.
> "There is a presumption of finality which attends all written contracts, and courts will not deliberately raise doubts or conjure ambiguities for the mere pleasure of construing them. Fairbanks Steam Shovel Co. v. Holt & Jeffery, 79 Wash. 361, 140 Pac. 394.
> "Nor will the fact that a party has made a hard or improvident bargain warrant the court in binding the other party to terms raised by construction or implication."

As there was no other question involved, it follows that the motion to change the venue should have been granted. The order denying the motion is reversed.

GENERAL MOTORS ACCEPTANCE CORPORATION v. PARKER. (Civ. 4445.)

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by the General Motors Acceptance Corporation against John A. Parker. From an order denying motion for change of venue, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Edward Bickmore, of Merced, and Thos. W. Firby, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Haswell & Pierce, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an appeal from an order refusing to change the place of trial. The facts are almost identical with, and the case involves no principle except as passed on by this court in General Motors Acceptance Corporation v. Joseph Codiga (Civ. No. 4443) 216 Pac. 383, filed May 5, 1923. The case was submitted by stipulation on the briefs filed in that case.

On the authority of the Codiga Case, the order denying the motion to change the place of trial is reversed.

BERENDSEN et al. v. BABDATY et al.
(Civ. 4234.)

Appeal and error 🔑771—Failure to file brief within time required held not "excusable neglect" under statute.

Evidence that counsel was under an unusual pressure of work, and that his health was poor, though not such as to preclude him from attending to any business, held insufficient to excuse under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, his failure to file his brief within the time required, nor would the fact that he relied upon his stenographer or clerk to notify him of the condition of his calendar, which was not done, constitute excusable neglect.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Excusable Neglect.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Action by J. C. Berendsen and others against A. Babdaty and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and named defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss. Motion granted.

C. M. Mooslin and Bernard Potter, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Samuel H. French, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. Plaintiffs have presented a motion to dismiss the appeal of defendant Babdaty herein for the reason that he has failed to file his opening brief within the time allowed by rule of this court, and the said defendant has filed a motion to be relieved from such default.

It appears that appellant was first late in filing the transcript on appeal, in that while it should have been filed not later than January 3, 1923, it was not until February 12, 1923, that it was actually filed. At that time the attorney representing plaintiffs wrote a letter regarding the matter of further delay to Bernard Potter, Esq., who was representing the appellant. It is not denied that the letter was received by Mr. Potter. A copy of the letter is as follows:

"February 12th, 1923.

"Mr. Bernard Potter, Title Insurance Building, Los Angeles, Calif.—Dear Mr. Potter: I have just signed the stipulation and acknowledged service on your transcript in the Babdaty case, and Parker & Stone told me that they would call for it to-morrow, and it will then be filed. In view of the very considerable delay in filing the transcript, which was inexcusable in your client, I am going to insist on the brief being filed within the proper time, which, as I figure it, will be on or before Thursday, March 15th. In view of the consideration which I have shown in the matter of the transcript, I think you will agree with me that this is only fair, and will also understand that my complaint in the matter is directed at your client and not at your own good self.

"With best personal regards, I am,
"Yours very truly, Samuel H. French."

Subdivision 4 of rule 2 of this court (176 Pac. viii) provides that—

"Within thirty days after the filing of the transcript, the appellant shall file with the clerk his printed points and authorities."

As is stated in the letter to Mr. Potter, the appellant's opening brief was due to be filed with the clerk of this court not later than March 15, 1923. On April 13, 1923, which was 29 days after appellant's opening brief was past due, and no brief having been filed in his behalf, respondents served upon attorneys for appellant their notice of motion to dismiss the appeal herein. Appellant does not contest the facts, but seeks to be relieved because of "mistake, inadvertence and excusable neglect" under the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. An affidavit of merits has been filed, together with an affidavit by Mr. Potter, to the effect that it has never been the intention of appellant to abandon the appeal, but that it has always been his endeavor in good faith to present it to the court; that although there is associate counsel in the case, and notwithstanding the fact that for several months last past Mr. Potter has been ill and in no fit condition to attend to business, Mr. Potter has had sole charge of the case and that he had been exceedingly busy in court and out of court for many weeks preceding the date of the filing of the motion to dismiss the appeal; that the reason Mr. Potter did not seek an extension of time within which to file appellant's points and authorities was that he expected to have his brief prepared and served within time and did not realize, on account of being engaged in court almost constantly, that the time was expiring or had expired and did not realize that the same had expired until the notice of motion to dismiss was served; that through inadvertence and neglect he did not examine his calendar, nor was his attention directed thereto; that it has been the habit of one of his stenographers to direct his attention to matters that were arising before they came on for hearing, but that some weeks before the opening brief became due the stenographer who had attended to such matters had left Mr. Potter's office, and the clerk maintained in the office was not in the habit of performing such duty.

Aside from the presumed knowledge possessed by the attorney representing appellant as to the time within which his points and authorities should, under the rule, be filed with the clerk of this court, the letter which was written to appellant's attorney by the attorney representing respondents particularly directed attention to former delays with reference to the filing of the transcript on appeal and, after pointing out that as to the briefs he would insist on their being filed within the proper time, specified "Thursday, March 15th," as being the limit for filing same.

The fact that appellant's counsel was under an unusual pressure of work and that his general health was poor cannot be accepted as a sufficient reason for excepting his case from the salutary rule requiring briefs to be filed within a certain time. If the law matters intrusted to his care were demanding so much of his time that it was an impracticability, considering the state of his health, for him to properly attend to the preparation of the opening brief in this case within the time permitted under the rule, the probabilities are that he could have obtained an extension of time either from opposing counsel or by an order of this court. It is said in Bailey v. Taaffe, 29 Cal. 424, that—

> "The relief sought is asked solely on the score of excusable neglect; and upon that subject all that is said is in substance that on account of the complicated condition of the defendant's title, and from the fact that the complaint was verified, more time was required to prepare the answer than is required in ordinary cases, and that during a portion of the time allowed for answering, the attorney employed to conduct the defense was compelled to be absent from town. But so far as all this tends to establish a legal excuse, it is completely and conclusively answered by the fact that no reason is given why, if more time was required, either on account of the complications suggested, or on account of the necessary absence of counsel, an application to opposite counsel, or if denied by him, to the court, for an extension of time was not made. If there was any good reason for an extension, doubtless it could have been readily obtained from opposite counsel by stipulation. If not, it certainly could have been obtained from the court by an order to that effect. There is therefore no pretense but that an extension of time could have been readily obtained from one source or the other had an application been made, and there is no pretense that an opportunity to make the application was, from any cause, not afforded. * * * In view of these facts, it cannot be said with any show of reason that the failure to answer in time is shown to have been excusable within the meaning of the law."

To the same effect, see Shain v. People's Lumber Co., 98 Cal. 122, 32 Pac. 878, where the court concludes the matter with the statement that—

> "If he neglects to procure a stipulation from the respondent, or an order of the court upon a proper affidavit, he is not in a position to resist a motion of the respondent to enforce the penalty which the rules have declared shall follow such neglect."

As showing generally that appellant is not entitled to the relief which he seeks, see McFadden v. Dietz, 115 Cal. 697, 47 Pac. 777; Suman v. Archibald, 116 Cal. 42, 47 Pac. 865; Pilger v. Strassman, 119 Cal. 692, 52 Pac. 40; McCabe v. Healey, 139 Cal. 30, 72 Pac. 359; Coats v. Coats, 146 Cal. 443, 80 Pac. 694; Egressy v. Stansbury, 149 Cal. 392, 87 Pac. 280; Barnhart v. Conley, 17 Cal. App. 230, 119 Pac. 200; Pierce v. Employers' Ind. Exchange, 33 Cal. App. 98, 164 Pac. 403.

Counsel's illness apparently was not so serious as to prevent him from attending to some of his business for other clients, and the fact that he chose to attend to such business rather than to the matter of preparing the brief in this case does not present a satisfactory reason for granting relief to appellant. Elliott v. Shaw, 16 Cal. 377; Ekel v. Swift, 47 Cal. 619; McGuire v. Drew, 83 Cal. 225, 23 Pac. 312.

That counsel did not personally examine his calendar, nor have his attention directed by either his stenographer or by his clerk to the fact that his brief either was about to become due or that the time had elapsed within which under the rule he might properly file same, is not enough to bring his neglect within the terms of the statute. The purpose of the rule is not only to facilitate the business of the court, but as well for the convenience and ultimate advantage of litigants. In order that it may be of value, it must be enforced.

It follows that respondents' motion to dismiss the appeal should be granted, and that appellant's motion to be relieved from his default should be denied. It is so ordered.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; CURTIS, J.

In re GRAVES. (Cr. 984.)

Appeal and error ⚷458(2)—Attorney and client ⚷56—Supersedeas will not issue to suspend judgment suspending attorney from practice of law, as such judgment is self-executing.

Supersedeas will not issue where the judgment does not command or permit any act to be done, or where it is not of a nature to be actively and affirmatively enforced by execution or otherwise; and, since a judgment suspending an attorney from the practice of law is self-executing, and requires no further action to be taken by the court below upon which supersedeas could act, the writ will not issue to suspend such judgment.

Application by M. O. Graves for a supersedeas to stay a judgment suspending him from the practice of law pending appeal. Writ denied.

Wheaton A. Gray and M. O. Graves, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Frank C. Collier, of Los Angeles, for respondent Los Angeles Bar Association.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an application for a supersedeas. By a judgment of the superior court for Los Angeles county, made January 22, 1923, petitioner was suspended from the practice of law for one year. From that judgment he has taken an appeal to this court, and now asks for a supersedeas to stay the judgment of suspension pending his appeal.

This is not a case for the issuance of supersedeas. The judgment of suspension acts directly against petitioner, without the necessity for process or proceedings of any kind for its enforcement. Tyler v. Presley, 72 Cal. 290, 13 Pac. 856. It is true that the power to issue the writ of supersedeas is inherent in an appellate court, but it will only be issued to restrain proceedings upon the judgment from which the appeal has been taken. Its effect is merely to stay proceedings for the enforcement of the judgment. It does not reverse, suspend, supersede, or impair the force of the judgment itself. That remains in all respects the same. The general rule, therefore, is that supersedeas will not issue where the judgment does not command or permit any act to be done, or where it is not of a nature to be actively and affirmatively enforced by execution or otherwise. Dulin v. Pacific Wood & Coal Co., 98 Cal. 304, 33 Pac. 123; Tyler v. Presley, supra; Hoppe v. Hoppe, 99 Cal. 536, 34 Pac. 222; Taylor v. Superior Court, 44 Cal. App. 23, 185 Pac. 994; Wood v. Board of Commissioners, 50 Cal. App. 594, 195 Pac. 739. Here the judgment of suspension is self-executing. There is no further action to be taken thereon by the court below, and consequently nothing upon which the supersedeas can act.

The application is denied.

I concur: WORKS, J.

CRAIG, J. I concur. During the argument counsel for petitioner insisted that, although supersedeas may not issue to suspend the operation of a self-executing judgment, it should issue in this case because a contempt proceeding might be instituted should he practice law during the pendency of this appeal. A contempt proceeding would be independent from, although of course an outgrowth of, the disbarment case. The possibility of such a proceeding does not make the judgment of suspension any less self-executing, nor does it create a ground for the issuance of a supersedeas. Wolf v. Gall, 174 Cal. 140, 162 Pac. 115.

REED v. PALMER et al. (Civ. 4463.)

1. Sales 🔑345—Where seller undertakes to keep goods safely, his failure to do so prevents recovery.

Where steel for building contract arrived too late for defendant buyers to accept it, but they were induced by seller to purchase it under a new contract, whereby seller was to keep the steel in its yards until called for, the performance of this duty to keep the property safely was a condition precedent to seller's right to recover the price.

2. Sales 🔑181(11)—Evidence held to show seller negligent in keeping goods.

Where steel for building contract arrived too late for defendant buyers to accept it, but they were induced by seller to purchase it under a new contract, whereby seller was to keep the steel in its yards until called for, evidence that the steel was stolen by the seller's superintendent, who was known to the seller's officers to be an ex-convict, and carted away by the purchaser from the superintendent during business hours, held to show that seller failed to exercise the degree of care required under its bailment.

3. Sales 🔑365—Finding that buyer suffered no damage held not to invalidate judgment.

Where steel for building contract arrived too late for defendant buyers to accept it, but they were induced by seller to purchase it under a new contract, whereby seller was to keep the steel in its yards until called for, and the steel was stolen from the seller's yards through its gross carelessness, a finding by the court, in rendering judgment for defendant buyers, in action for the price of the goods stolen, that buyers had suffered no damage, held not to invalidate the judgment; being immaterial so far as plaintiff was concerned.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by T. H. Reed against P. A. Palmer and another, copartners, doing business under the firm name and style of Palmer & Petersen. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Haven, Athearn, Chandler & Farmer, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Hartley F. Peart and Chas. V. Barfield, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Action to recover the sum of $2,219.88 alleged to be the balance of the purchase price of certain steel sold by plaintiff's assignor to defendants.

Concerning the facts there is little or no controversy. It appears therefrom that defendants were, on or about May 25, 1917, constructing a certain building for the United States government. In connection therewith they required certain structural steel, and they entered into a contract with the Concrete Engineering Company, plaintiff's assignor, to supply them with this material. The steel consisted of about 85 tons of reenforcing bars, for which defendants agreed to pay $4.40 per hundredweight, amounting in all to the sum of $4,719.88. Delivery was to be made upon a certain date, but the steel did not arrive according to schedule, and defendants thereupon notified plaintiff's assignor of this fact, informing it at the same time that they would be compelled to obtain the material elsewhere, and could not therefore accept delivery of the same as contracted for. The steel subsequently arrived, but too late to be used in the construction of the building for which defendants had purchased it. Efforts were then made to induce the defendants to receive it, notwithstanding the fact of its tardy arrival. These efforts proved successful, and a new arrangement was during December, 1917, thereupon entered into between the parties, by which defendants purchased and the vendor sold the steel originally contracted for, to be used in other work. The vendor continued in possession of the material and agreed to keep the same for defendants at its yard in San Francisco until called for. One of the conditions of the new arrangement was that defendants should pay the entire purchase price originally agreed upon within 90 days after December 14, 1917. Upon the completion of this agreement, the steel was switched from the railroad to the yards of plaintiff's assignor, and there unloaded.

Thereafter defendants called for and received delivery of a portion of the steel, amounting to some 20 or 25 tons, for which they gave their check in payment. Subsequently defendants asked for delivery of the remaining portion thereof, but it was then discovered that the steel had been stolen and sold as junk by the superintendent of plaintiff's assignor. Notwithstanding this fact, payment for the same was demanded by the concrete company. Defendants refused to comply with this demand, and the present suit resulted. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of defendants for their costs, and this is an appeal from such judgment.

It is conceded that the transaction had between the parties amounted to a completed sale, and that the title to the steel had passed thereunder to defendants prior to the theft. This being so, it is the claim of the appellant that the loss followed the title, and defendants became liable for the contract price. The answer of the defendants, however, set up the defense that at the time the new arrangement was entered into, and in consideration thereof, the concrete company agreed to safely store and keep the steel at its storage yard, and that under such agreement it became a depositary for hire, both by reason of its contract, and by the express provisions of section 1748 of the Civil Code, and that the purchase price was not due therefor until the vendor had fulfilled this trust under the bailment and delivered the property to respondents.

[1] There can be no question that where a duty is imposed upon a vendor to safely keep property which is the subject of a sale the performance of such duty is a condition precedent to his right of recovery. The trial court found that there was a negligent bailment of the goods; the finding being that the concrete company wholly failed and neglected to safely store and keep the materials, and that the same was stolen through the gross carelessness and negligence of the company and sold to other parties.

[2] It is claimed by the appellant that this finding is not supported by the evidence. In this connection it is argued that a warehouseman is not liable for goods stolen by his servants unless his negligence has contributed to the theft. It is true a bailee is not an insurer; but there is ample evidence in the record to show that no care whatsoever was taken of the goods. The president and general manager of the company so testified. There is also testimony to show that the steel was stolen by the superintendent of the company and was carted away by the purchaser during business hours. The superintendent was an ex-convict, and was known by the officers of the company to be such long prior to the time the transaction in question took place. These facts, taken together, show the company failed to exercise the degree of care required under its bailment, and they fully support the finding of the trial court upon the subject.

The final contention is made that, as the court found that defendant had suffered no damage, the judgment must for this reason be reversed.

[3] In concluding its findings, the court did recite that defendants had not been damaged in any sum. There was evidence in the record to show that the price of steel had advanced subsequent to the date of the contract and at the time of its theft. The finding was evidently made to conclude defendants upon any right they might have by reason of this fact; or it may have been inserted by the trial court upon the theory that as defendants had failed to pay for the steel they had therefore suffered no damage, for which reason a finding to this effect was necessary to do complete justice between the parties. Whatever the purpose, its mere presence does not require a reversal of the judgment upon the ground that it is against the evidence. The title to the steel having passed by reason of the sale, defendants were liable for its value unless their defense of a negligent bailment was sound. The court, under sufficient evidence, found it to be so, and that finding rightfully concludes the substantial rights of the parties. Findings should be reconciled and harmonized where possible, and should not be declared contradictory except when absolutely necessary. They should be given such a construction as will support the judgment, if this may be reasonably done, rather than one which will defeat it. So construed, it plainly appears therefrom that, plaintiff's assignor having been negligent in the care of the property, defendants were relieved from liability for the cost of the material. The presence or absence of the finding objected to, so far as appellant is concerned, is of no consequence to him.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SHELEST. (Cr. 939.)

1. Criminal law 🔑407(2)—Statement taken from others in accused's presence inculpating him held admissible.

Statement taken in accused's presence by officers from two others, which directly connected accused with a murder, was admissible, together with evidence that accused was silent during the taking of the statement, such conduct being relevant as admission of guilt, and the admissibility of the evidence was not affected by the fact that accused was under arrest when the statement was made.

2. Criminal law 🔑409, 741(3)—Implied admission has weight, but evidentiary value for jury.

An implied admission may have as much weight as one made in express terms; what evidentiary value shall be given to either being for the jury.

3. Homicide 🔑253(1)—Evidence held to show first degree murder.

Conviction of murder in the first degree held warranted by the evidence.

4. Criminal law 🔑1172(2)—Instruction on confession of conspirator held not harmful to accused.

Where accused and two others were jointly indicted for murder, and no confession was introduced except that of his codefendants, an instruction as to corroboration of proof of confession by admissions and declarations made to a coconspirator by the confessing one, was not harmful to accused, especially where the court expressly limited the testimony concerning the confessions of the codefendants to the people's case against one of the codefendants.

5. Criminal law 🔑423(2)—Acts and declarations of other conspirators admissible against accused, although not made in his presence.

The acts and declarations of other conspirators in furtherance of the conspiracy held admissible against accused, although not made in his presence or affirmed by him.

6. Criminal law 🔑938(3)—Newly discovered evidence held not to require new trial.

Where accused and two others were jointly indicted for murder, affidavit by one of the codefendants, subsequent to the trial, that accused was not present at the time of the homicide, held not to require new trial, where such codefendant had not been asked by accused to take the stand during the trial, although in the courtroom.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

John Shelest was convicted of murder in the first degree, with life imprisonment, and appeals from the judgment of conviction and order denying new trial. Judgment and order affirmed.

Ford & Bodkin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. John Shelest was indicted jointly with Adam Blaszyk and Valentine Radecki for the crime of murder. After a trial Shelest was convicted. The penalty was fixed at life imprisonment, and from the judgment duly pronounced by the court and an order denying him a new trial he appeals. The general ground relied upon for a reversal is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, in that it does not connect him with the commission of the crime except through a certain statement which it is claimed was improperly received.

It appears that Nancy Wheelock, the proprietress of a lodging house in Los Angeles, was murdered through strangulation on the afternoon of April 29, 1922. The evidence intended to connect Shelest with the commission of the crime, other than the statement to which reference has been made, was as follows: Evelyn Shellhouse, who lived in the rooming house, testified that Blaszyk and Radecki and herself occupied an apartment together, that Shelest did not live at the house, but called to see Blaszyk and Radecki several times, but that the robbery of Mrs. Wheelock was not discussed when he was present. Shelest was arrested about midnight on April 30, 1922, and denied that he knew either of his codefendants, or Mrs. Shellhouse, or that he had ever been at their apartment. Officer Bean, a witness called by the people, testified that Shelest told him that he saw Blaszyk and Radecki hit Mrs. Wheelock. Shelest lived in a house conducted by Mrs. Saragosa. Officer Cline testified that when arrested Shelest stated that on April 29th he came down town about 1:30 in the afternoon and went to the office of the Motor Transit Company and returned to his home at 3:30 p. m.; that he remained there all of that afternoon; that he had dinner about 6 o'clock, and, being accompanied by Mrs. Saragosa, went down town and attended a show, after which he returned to his home and remained there the rest of the night. Mrs. Saragosa testified that Shelest was at her residence on the afternoon of the 29th up to 2:30 p. m.; that he left at that time and did not return until 8 o'clock that evening. Mrs. Stewart, who is Mrs. Saragosa's mother, corroborated this evidence. When arrested and at the time Shelest said he did not know his codefendant, Officer Cline took a piece of paper from the person of the appellant upon which appeared the name of Adam Ward, an alias used by Radecki, and asked him if he wrote the name and if he did not know Radecki and Blaszyk, to which Cline testified appellant would make no answer. Soon after Blaszyk and Radecki were brought into the room where Shelest was, and he refused to say anything.

On May 2, 1922, a statement was taken in the presence and within the hearing of Shelest and made by Blaszyk and Radecki which they, later, signed. It appears that the officers addressed themselves to Blaszyk and Radecki exclusively, and did not ask Shelest whether what his codefendants said was true or false. Previous to the taking of this statement, Officer Bean had said to Shelest, while the latter was under arrest, "We know you. Boy, you are not telling the truth." The statement which was signed by Blaszyk and Radecki admittedly connected Shelest directly with the murder. It is unnecessary to quote it in full, but the essentials of it were Blaszyk and Radecki doing the talking, that Radecki knocked on Mrs. Wheelock's door and told her to read the gas meter; that she then came into their room, where Blaszyk, alias Ward, was waiting with a towel, which Radecki took and put over the woman's face, and Blaszyk grabbed her person. At this time Shelest knocked at the door and said, "Open the door." He was let in, and he asked, "What is the matter?" Blaszyk answered: "We pretty near killed the old lady," and Shelest replied: "All right, all right." Shelest suggested to Blaszyk that "he tie the handkerchief," which Blaszyk did, around her neck. Shelest searched Mrs. Wheelock's trunk. Blaszyk and Radecki took her to her own room and laid her on a couch. They secured a few cents in silver from her pocketbook and took some jewelry. They then, just before half past three in the afternoon, left Mrs. Wheelock's place and checked a suitcase at a checking station, Shelest accompanying the other two. Blaszyk and Shelest went to a toilet, looked over some books they had taken, and threw a check and nearly everything they had secured away. Shelest threw some of the stuff on top. They then secured a room; Shelest taking part in the negotiations in the rooming house. Later he left the others. Shelest took a ring that had been taken from Mrs. Wheelock.

In the course of this statement Shelest's codefendants said that prior to the murder he had suggested that they rob somebody, and had discussed robbing Mrs. Wheelock. Appellant contends that this statement made by Blaszyk and Radecki was erroneously admitted in evidence because the statement of one conspirator cannot be used as against his coconspirators, when it is made after the conspiracy has been carried out, or unless its making is in some way in furtherance of the conspiracy; also it is insisted that no conspiracy was shown to exist in this instance except by the statements of Blaszyk and Radecki.

[1] The evidence objected to was clearly admissible, not as a statement of a coconspirator, but because the conduct of the defendant was relevant as an admission of guilt when accused of sharing in the crime. The jury might well believe that no innocent man would remain silent when accused of participation in such atrocious conduct. Silence under these circumstances may always be proved. People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 531, 66 Pac. 794; People v. Philbon, 138 Cal. 530, 71 Pac. 650; People v. Bradley, 23 Cal. App. 44, 136 Pac. 955; People v. Ayhens, 16 Cal. App. 618, 117 Pac. 789. Of course, the statements made by Radecki and Blaszyk could not be received except to explain and aid the jury in construing the defendant's conduct. The fact that the defendant was under arrest when the statement was made does not render it any less admissible. People v. Amaya, supra; People v. Schoon, 177 Cal. 678, 171 Pac. 680; People v. Byrne, 160 Cal. 217, 116 Pac. 521; People v. McCrea, 32 Cal. 98; People v. Estrado, 49 Cal. 171; People v. Ah Yute, 53 Cal. 613.

[2-4] An implied admission may have as much weight as one made in express terms, and what evidentiary value shall be given to either in any case is a matter for the jury to determine. We think the entire evidence warranted the verdict of guilty which was rendered. The following instruction was given by the court, and appellant contends this constituted prejudicial error:

> "A conspirator having confessed, it is competent to prove admissions and declarations made by him to a coconspirator, as tending to corroborate the proof of confession and establish the fact confessed."

Inasmuch as no confession was introduced except those of Blaszyk and Radecki, it cannot be assumed that the jury regarded this instruction as having any application to Shelest. No witness testified to a confession by him, and, as it was received, the trial court expressly limited the testimony concerning the confessions of Blaszyk and Radecki to the people's case against Blaszyk. Under the circumstances it is not conceivable that Shelest could have been injured by it.

[5] Appellant insists that the court committed error in refusing to give the following instruction requested by him:

> "You are instructed that no acts or declarations of the defendants Adam Blaszyk and Valentine Radecki, not made in the presence of the defendant John Shelest and not affirmed by him, are to be considered as evidence against the defendant John Shelest."

This instruction was properly refused. If a conspiracy was shown to exist between Blaszyk and Radecki and Shelest to take the life of Mrs. Wheelock, acts and declarations of Blaszyk or Radecki in furtherance of the conspiracy would be evidence against Shelest. The instruction would exclude all acts and declarations of the other conspirators, unless made in the presence of Shelest or affirmed by him. This is not the law.

[6] It is urged that the motion for a new trial should have been granted and that its denial was reversible error. This motion was founded upon alleged newly discovered evidence. The basis of this claim is that Shelest's codefendant Blaszyk, subsequent to the trial, made an affidavit to the effect that it is not true that Shelest told him to tie the handkerchief around Mrs. Wheelock's neck, nor was he present when this was done, and that Radecki had told Blaszyk that Shelest had told him (Blaszyk) to tie the handkerchief. Blaszyk was present in court at the time of the trial. No formal attempt was made to have him testify. Blaszyk and Shelest were represented by different counsel, and it is claimed that Blaszyk's attorney informed appellant's counsel that the latter would not testify. However, no subpœna was issued for Blaszyk, nor was he asked to take the stand during the trial, although continually in the courtroom. Under these circumstances, we think the trial court properly denied the motion for a new trial.

BRYSON et al. v. BRYSON et al.
(Civ. 4169.)

1. Corporations 🔑282—Director must be stockholder.

Under Civ. Code, § 305, director of corporation, at least as between him and the corporation, must be a stockholder therein.

2. Corporations 🔑114 — Stockholder could make valid transfer as between him and transferee, though certificate in trustee's possession.

Certificate of stock is only evidence of ownership, and, though holder of one share had delivered certificate to trust company under terms of a trust, he could make valid transfer of the stock as between him and the transferee.

3. Corporations 🔑282—Stockholder, who, as officer, issued new certificate to transferee of his stock, held to render himself ineligible as director.

Where holder of share of stock, the certificate for which had been delivered to trust company, under terms of a trust, as vice president, issued new certificate to transferee of his stock, he divested himself of title and rendered himself ineligible to election as director, though original certificate was not surrendered and canceled.

4. Trusts 🔑172—Trustee must strictly follow directions contained in trust agreement in absence of discretionary powers.

Directions contained in trust agreement are sole guide to conduct of trustee, and to it alone he must look for his orders and must strictly follow them in absence of conferred discretionary powers.

5. Corporations 🔑198—Trustee of corporate stock bound to follow directions of trust agreement that stock be voted for directors then in office.

Where stock was transferred to trust company in trust to vote it at stockholders' meetings for election, as directors, of persons then in office, it was bound to comply with such restrictions and had no authority to vote for one who had ceased to be stockholder and had theretofore resigned as director.

6. Evidence 🔑450(1)—No ambiguity in trust declaration and acceptance admitting evidence of trustor's declarations, and they were inadmissible.

Though declaration of trust purported to cover all corporate stock except seven shares held by directors, while trustee's acceptance purported to include the seven shares, where it required trustee to vote the stock at stockholders' meetings for re-election of directors then in office, there was no ambiguity so far as concerned the questions whether one, who had transferred his stock and ceased to be director, was eligible to election, and whether trustee had authority to elect him, and trustor's declarations before acceptance of the trust were inadmissible under Civ. Code, § 2254.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Bertin A. Weyl, Judge.

Action by James F. Bryson and others against Isaac H. Bryson and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John F. Keogh, C. C. Mishler, E. W. Sargent, E. J. Vaughn, and George B. Colby, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Newby & Palmer and O. L. Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought under section 315 of the Civil Code to declare illegal and void the election of Isaac H. Bryson and Joseph S. Bryson as directors of the Bryson Estate Company.

Considering the fact that Joseph S. Bryson is one of the plaintiffs in the action and is a respondent herein, the appeal need be considered only with reference to the election of Isaac H. Bryson.

In the month of May, 1907, the Bryson Estate Company was organized as a corporation with a capital stock of $600,000, divided 'nto 60,000 shares of the par value of $10 per share. One share each was subscribed by and issued to Isaac H. Bryson and six other persons, and those seven persons composed the board of directors for the first year of the life of the corporation. By-laws for the corporation were adopted which, among other things, provided that directors of the corporation should be elected by ballot at the annual meeting of the stockholders, and that they were to serve for one year and until their successors were elected. The by-laws also provided that shares of stock of the corporation might be transferred by the holder thereof by indorsement of the certificate of stock, but that no transfer should be valid until the certificate was surrendered and acknowledgment of such transfer entered on the books of the corporation.

Contemporaneously with the organization of the Bryson Estate Company, John Bryson, Sr., and Evaline Bryson, his wife, being the owners of a piece of property known as the Bryson Block, located in the city of Los Angeles, executed a declaration of trust wherein they agreed to grant to the Bryson Estate Company the real property upon which the Bryson Block was located. Among other things, the declaration of trust further provided that all the stock of the Bryson Estate Company, to wit, 60,000 shares, less 7 shares held by the board of directors, should be issued in the name of the Title Guarantee & Trust Company as trustee, to be held by it in trust for several purposes, including "(2) to vote said stock as a unit at all stockholders' meetings held during the existence of this trust for the election of directors of said corporation for the persons in office as directors at the time such meeting or meetings are held."

By an instrument of date May 21, 1907, the Title Guarantee & Trust Company acknowledged receipt of the entire stock of the Bryson Estate Company, including the 7 shares issued to its directors, and in said instrument declared that the stock was to be held by it "in trust in accordance with that certain document (the declaration of trust) dated the 20th day of May, 1907."

The minutes of the first meeting of the directors of the Bryson Estate Company, held on May 20, 1907, being the same day on which the declaration of trust was executed, among other things, contained the following:

> "And thereupon it was announced by each of the directors present that each of them was willing to join in said trust and deposit with the trustee hereinafter named their and each of their certificates of one share each in the capital stock of this corporation, and which was issued to them at the time of the incorporation of this company, the same to be held in trust according to the terms of said instrument. The said trust company above referred to is known as the Title Guarantee & Trust Company of Los Angeles, California."

All the directors of the Bryson Estate Company, with the exception of Isaac H. Bryson, were present at said meeting of the board of directors.

Following the organization of the Bryson Estate Company the trustee was present, either by authorized representative or "by consent," at all annual stockholders' meetings of that corporation, and (with the exception of the meeting of which complaint is here made) cast its ballot for directors in accordance with the requirement of the declaration of trust; that is, "for the persons in office as directors at the time such meetings were held." Up to the time the eight certificates of stock representing the entire capital stock of the corporation were assigned to the trustee, there had been a total of ten certificates issued, but one of them having been originally issued to John Bryson for 29,996½ shares and another certificate to Evaline Bryson for a like number of shares, these two certificates were surrendered and canceled, and in lieu thereof a new certificate for 59,993 shares was issued directly to the trustee. After that time, on account of resignations of various directors and the election of other directors in the places of those resigned, seven other certificates were issued by the corporation. In each case as a new certificate was issued to an incoming director, he assigned and delivered his certificate of stock to the trustee. Upon receiving the new certificate the trustee canceled the old certificate and surrendered it to the corporation—that is, the trustee followed such course as to three of the new certificates, but did not either cancel or surrender as to four of such certificates.

The ultimate questions to be decided are:

(1) Was Isaac H. Bryson eligible to be elected a director of the Bryson Estate Company on July 11, 1921?

(2) Was the trustee authorized to vote for the election of Isaac H. Bryson at the stockholders' meeting on July 11, 1921?

[1] It is settled law in this state, by reason of the statute, as well as by adjudications by the court of last resort, that a director of a corporation, at least as between him and the corporation, must be a stockholder therein. Civ. Code, § 305; Rozecrans Mining Co. v. Morey, 111 Cal. 114, 43 Pac. 585; Seal of Gold Mining Co. v. Slater, 161 Cal. 621, 120 Pac. 15.

Isaac H. Bryson was one of the incorporators of the Bryson Estate Company and was among those directors who assigned their stock to and deposited it with the trustee to be held in trust in accordance with the terms of the trust agreement. At a special directors' meeting, held on April 18, 1918, Mr. Bryson, after having acted as a director and as vice president of the corporation for many years, resigned as such director and officer, which resignation was accepted by the corporation to take effect as of date May 1, 1918. On the same day on which Isaac H. Bryson tendered his resignation as vice president of the corporation and as a director therein, he issued a new certificate of stock to Jeneva L. Levy in lieu of the certificate of stock which had theretofore been issued to him and which was on deposit in trust with the trustee herein. On the stub of the new certificate it was stated that the new certificate was in lieu of the certificate formerly held by Isaac H. Bryson. This new certificate was assigned in blank and delivered to the trustee, but the original certificate issued to Isaac H. Bryson was one of the original four certificates for which new certificates were issued and which original certificates were retained by the trustee in its possession, together with the new certificates issued to replace them. Jeneva L. Levy was thereupon elected by the board of directors to fill the vacancy on the board caused by the retirement of Isaac H. Bryson, who thereafter neither performed nor assumed to perform any duties either as a director or as an officer of said corporation, but his place on the board was filled by Jeneva L. Levy, who thereafter continuously performed the duties of a director thereon from the date of her said election up to, including, and after the 11th day of July, 1921, being the date on which the trustee attempted to reinstate Mr. Bryson as a director on the board of the corporation. Beginning with May 1, 1918, and including July 11, 1921, there was no change in the personnel of the board of directors. At the adjourned annual meeting of the stockholders, held on July 11, 1921, the trustee was present and voted the 59,993 shares of stock for a board of directors, including Isaac H. Bryson and Jeneva L. Levy; Mr. Bryson being at that time not a member of the board of directors, and Jeneva L. Levy, being a member thereof, having theretofore on the 18th day of April, 1918, acquired from Mr. Bryson her qualifying share of stock in the corporation, as hereinbefore stated.

[2, 3] A certificate of stock is only evidence of ownership, and notwithstanding the fact that the physical possession of the certificate of the Bryson stock was in the trustee, Bryson was none the less the owner of the stock itself. Whether he had possession or not of the certificate did not prevent him from making a valid transfer of the stock as between him and the transferee. In issuing a new certificate he clearly indicated, both as an individual owner and as an officer of the corporation, that a transfer was intended, and by such transfer he clearly divested himself of all title to the stock. The fact that as vice president of the corporation, acting as the executive officer thereof in issuing a new certificate before the original certificate (in lieu of which the new certificate was issued) was surrendered to the corporation and properly canceled, is of no materiality as affecting the question of transfer of title as between Bryson as an individual and the transferee of the stock. There is nothing in the record to show that Bryson ever acquired title to any other stock of the corporation, and hence it must be concluded that on July 11, 1921, he was not a stockholder and consequently was ineligible to be elected to office as director of the corporation.

The trust agreement provides that the stock delivered to the trustee shall be voted "as a unit at all stockholders' meetings of the Bryson Estate Company that are held during the existence of the trust for the election of directors of said corporation for the persons in office as directors at the time such meeting or meetings are held."

[4] It is a principle in the law of trusts that the directions contained within the trust agreement are the sole guide to the conduct of the trustee. It is to the trust agreement and to that only to which he must look for his orders and which orders, in the absence of conferred discretionary powers, he must strictly follow without question or hesitation. Pomeroy, Eq. Jurisp. § 1062.

In 26 Ruling Case Law, p. 1372, it is said that—

> "It is an elementary principle in the law of trusts that in the execution of a trust, the trustee is bound to comply strictly with the directions contained in the trust instrument, defining the extent and limits of his authority, and the nature of his powers and duties."

And in the case of Murphy v. Delano (1901) 95 Me. 229, 49 Atl. 1053, 55 L. R. A. 727, the following language appears in the opinion of the court:

> "It is an elementary principle in the law of trusts that: 'Under the general obligations of carrying the trust into execution, trustees are bound, in the first place, to conform strictly to the directions of the trust. * * * The trust itself, whatever it be, constitutes the charter of the trustee's powers and duties. From it he derives the rule of his conduct. It prescribes the extent and limits of his authority. It furnishes the measure of his obligation.'"

[5] More specifically, in a case of this kind in which the duty of casting a ballot at the stockholders' meeting is cast upon a trustee, he is bound to comply with the restrictions contained within the trust instrument creating the trust. Fletcher, Cyclopedia Corporations, p. 2804; Byington v. Piazza, 131 App. Div. 895, 115 N. Y. Supp. 918; Elger v. Boyle, 69 Misc. Rep. 273, 126 N. Y. Supp. 946.

Irrespective of the question as to who were members of the board of directors of the Bryson Estate Company on July 11, 1921, it is certain that Isaac H. Bryson was not a member thereof at that time, and under the directions of the trust (which the trustee was bound to follow), to the effect that the trustee should vote for the persons then in office as directors of the company, the election of Bryson by the trustee was an act not in conformity with the terms of the trust and was outside the authority of the trustee.

[6] Appellants contend that the court erred in rejecting the proposed testimony of a witness which would have had the effect of explaining the inconsistency between the declaration of the trustors and the acceptance by the trustee and "give the court light as to what was the intention of the trustors," in that by the declaration of trust the seven qualifying shares of the directors of the corporation were reserved from the operation of the trust, while by the acceptance the receipt of those seven shares is acknowledged, with the statement that the entire capital stock is to be held in trust in accordance "with the said document" (the declaration of trust of date May 20, 1907).

Assuming, without deciding, that an ambiguity exists, the law probably favors appellants' contention. However, the situation of those seven shares of stock, whether within or without the trust, is of no materiality so far as a decision of the points involved in the action before the trial court was concerned. Its only interest was in determining, first, whether Isaac H. Bryson was a stockholder of the corporation at the time of the election in question; and, secondly, as to whether the trustee at that time voted the stock in accordance with the terms of the trust agreement. There was neither an ambiguity nor a contradiction of provisions in the trust agreement with reference to either of the matters before the court, and in their absence, at least in the circumstances of this case, the rule is that the declarations of the trustor to his trustee in relation of the trust, made before the trust has been accepted, are to be deemed as a part of the declaration of trust, except that when a declaration of trust is made in writing, all previous declarations by the same trustor are merged therein. Civ. Code, § 2254.

Other matters discussed in the respective briefs of counsel are incidental to the questions here considered.

No prejudicial error appearing in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. THURMAN. (Cr. 953.)

1. Insurrection and sedition ⚷2—Information held insufficient to charge accused with printing and publishing documents to promote criminal syndicalism.

An information charging criminal syndicalism, in that accused printed, published, edited, circulated, and displayed certain documents containing and carrying written and printed advocacy, teaching, and aid and abetment of criminal syndicalism, and also charging that these documents were so printed, published, edited, circulated, and displayed "in order to organize and assist in organizing and inducing to become members of" the I. W. W., held only to charge accused with assisting in organizing in violation of Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subd. 4, and not to charge a violation of subsection 3, relating to the publication of such documents.

2. Insurrection and sedition ⚷2—Withdrawing charge that accused was member of I. W. W. from jury held not error.

Where accused was charged with having become a member of the I. W. W., but where there was no evidence that he became a member in the county in which he was tried, and in which the crime was alleged to have been committed, or that he became a member within three years prior to the filing of the information, held, that the court properly withdrew such charge from the jury.

3. Insurrection and sedition ⚷2 — Evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction for criminal syndicalism; "assist;" "organize."

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, under Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subd. 4, in that accused assisted in organizing the I. W. W., evidence of printing and publication of documents held insufficient to sustain conviction, the term "assisting," as ordinarily used, importing a contribution of effort in the complete accomplishment of an ultimate purpose intended to be effected by those engaged, the word "organize" meaning to form with suitable organs and qualify for the exercise of its appropriate functions.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Assist; Organize.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Roscoe Thurman was convicted of criminal syndicalism, and he appeals. Reversed.

R. W. Henderson, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendant was found guilty of criminal syndicalism under subdivision 4 of section 2 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act of 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 281), and now appeals from the judgment of conviction. His sole point is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict.

Subdivision 4 of section 2 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act provides that a person is guilty of the crime denounced thereby if he "organizes or assists in organizing, or is or knowingly becomes a member of, any organization, society, group or assemblage of persons organized or assembled to advocate, teach or aid and abet criminal syndicalism"; and by section 1 criminal syndicalism is defined as "any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, sabotage (which word is hereby defined as meaning willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property), or unlawful acts of force and violence or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or affecting any political change."

The information charges that on May 30, 1921, in the county of Imperial, defendant assisted in organizing and became a member of an organization, group, and assemblage of persons known as the Industrial Workers of the World, sometimes known as the "I. W. W.," which, it is alleged, was organized for the purpose of advocating, teaching, aiding, abetting, committing, and attempting to commit, criminal syndicalism, sabotage, violence, and unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership and effecting political changes.

The information, which, as drafted, is an exceedingly inartificial pleading, contains allegations which at first blush might lead to the supposition that the district attorney intended also to charge defendant with a violation of subdivision 3 of section 2 of the act; for it is alleged that defendant printed, published, edited, circulated, and publicly displayed certain documents (copies of which are set forth in the information) containing and carrying written and printed advocacy, teaching, and aid and abetment of criminal syndicalism. But in this connection the information also charges that these documents were so printed, published, edited, circulated, and publicly displayed "in order to organize and assist in organizing and inducing persons to become members of said organization"—the Industrial Workers of the World.

[1] If the district attorney did intend to charge defendant with the violation, not only of subdivision 4, but also of subdivision 3, his attempt at such double charge was so abortive that the learned judge of the trial court very properly, as we think, took from the jury any consideration of the charge of violating subdivision 3 by instructing them that:

> "The offense with which the defendant is charged is, omitting those matters which in the opinion of the court are immaterial or not well stated, that the defendant did willfully and unlawfully assist in organizing [italics ours] a society, organization or group of persons known as the Industrial Workers of the World, by circulating and distributing certain literature set out in the information."

[2] Though defendant was charged with having become a member of the organization known as the Industrial Workers of the World, there was no evidence that he became a member in Imperial county—the county in which he was tried, and in which the crime is alleged to have been committed—or that he became a member within three years prior to the filing of the information. The court therefore instructed the jury that there "is no evidence that the defendant became a member of said organization in this county, or within three years prior to the filing of the information, and that particular element of the charge as contained in the information therefore fails."

The net result of the foregoing is this: The information adequately charges defendant with two and only two separate and distinct criminal acts, namely: (1) The act of becoming a member of an organization or society organized to advocate and teach "criminal syndicalism," as those words are defined in section 1 of the statute; and (2) the act of assisting in organizing such organization or society. Each of these acts is a crime under subdivision 4 of section 2 of the statute. Because there was a failure to prove that defendant became a member of the organization, as charged in the information, that part of the charge was withdrawn from the jury. Therefore the only crime of which defendant was convicted is that of assisting in organizing an organization or society, known as the Industrial Workers of the World, organized to advocate and teach "criminal syndicalism."

[3] The sole questions presented by this appeal are therefore these: (1) Is there evidence to support the implied finding that the defendant assisted in organizing the Industrial Workers of the World? (2) Did the prosecution adduce sufficient evidence to support the implied finding that the Industrial Workers of the World is an organization or society organized to advocate, teach, or aid and abet any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, sabotage, or unlawful acts of force and violence, or unlawful methods of terrorism, as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting a political change? It will not be necessary to consider the second question, for we are satisfied that the evidence is wholly insufficient to show that the defendant assisted in organizing the Industrial Workers of the World, or any local branch thereof.

The only evidence to which our attention has been called which was relied upon by the prosecution to prove that appellant assisted in organizing the Industrial Workers of the World, or any local thereof, is testimony to the effect that he published and distributed the printed documents, copies of which are set forth in the information. This literature was of the nature of propaganda, and doubtless was published and distributed for the purpose of inducing its readers to join the Industrial Workers of the World. There is nothing to show that any reader was induced thereby to become a member, or to apply for membership. Indeed there is nothing to show that the propaganda was read by any one other than the town marshal of Brawley. Had the information, or a separate count thereof, properly charged defendant with a violation of subdivision 3 of section 2 of the act it is possible that proof, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant did so publish and distribute this printed propaganda would alone have sufficed to justify a conviction. But, as we have seen, if an attempt was made to charge defendant with violating subdivison 3, the district attorney's effort in that direction so far miscarried that the learned trial judge was prompted to advise the jury that defendant was charged with assisting in organizing the Industrial Workers of the World by circulating and distributing the literature set out in the information—thus, in effect, taking from the jury the right to consider whether subdivision 3 of section 2 of the act had been violated. The defendant, therefore, was improperly convicted if the evidence fails to sustain the only charge which the court submitted to the consideration of the jury, namely, the charge that defendant "assisted in organizing" a society, group, or assemblage of persons alleged to be within the purview of the condemnatory provisions of the statute.

Respondent's contention that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the charge that appellant assisted in organizing the Industrial Workers of the World raises the question of the proper interpretation of the words "assists in organizing," as those words are used in subdivision 4 of section 2 of the act. The word "organize," as used in common parlance, has no doubtful or ambiguous meaning. Warren v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co., 115 Mo. 572, 22 S. W. 490. To organize means "to form with suitable organs." Webster; Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) vol. 21, p. 1008. An organ is defined to be "an instrument or medium by which an action is performed or an object accomplished." Com. v. Wm. Mann Co., 150 Pa. 64, 24 Atl. 601. An entity, an assemblage of persons, for example, is "organized" when it is furnished with organs—when it is "endowed with capacity for the functions of life" (Webster)—"qualified for the exercise of its appropriate functions." Com. v. Wm. Mann Co., supra. "The very term 'organization' implies a recognition of order, and an obedience to duly constituted authority." In re Redmond, 5 Misc. Rep. 374, 25 N. Y. Supp. 384. " 'Organization' is defined as 'an arrangement of parties' (sic); 'the act of organizing,' as 'the organization of a government, or of flocks, or of a railroad or other corporation'; 'the connection of parts in and for a whole, so that each part is, at once, end and means.' " In re Sanders, 53 Kan. 191, 36 Pac. 348, 23 L. R. A. 603. To organize is a very different thing from extending the limits of the organization or adding to or increasing its size. "To organize a certain territory into a municipal corporation," says the court in Warren v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co., supra, "is a very different thing from that of extending the limits of an organized city over new territory."

The words "assist" and "aid" are synonymous, and each imports a contribution of effort supplementing the efforts of another. State v. Flynn, 76 N. J. Law, 473, 72 Atl. 296; State v. Tally, 102 Ala. 25, 15 South. 722; People v. Bond, 13 Cal. App. 185, 109 Pac. 150. There is a wide difference between assisting in the commission of an act and attempting to commit the act. "An attempt to commit a crime is an endeavor to accomplish it, carried beyond mere preparation, but falling short of the execution of the ultimate purpose in any part of it." 1 Bouvier, Law Dictionary, p. 190. In the absence of such a permissive statutory provision as that which is contained in section 663 of our Penal Code, it has been held that where a defendant is charged with an attempt to commit a crime he cannot be convicted if the evidence shows that he actually consummated the crime. Graham v. People, 181 Ill. 477, 55 N. E. 179, 47 L. R. A. 731. While the word "attempt" implies that the accused fell short of a consummation of his purpose to commit the crime, the word "assist," on the other hand, as ordinarily used, imports a contribution of effort by the accused in the complete accomplishment of the ultimate purpose intended to be effected by him and by those whose efforts his work supplemented. It was said in Hurst v. State, 79 Ala. 55, that:

> "The clause 'assists such prisoner to escape,' in its ordinary import, means that the prisoner does effect his escape, and that he has assistance in accomplishing it."

So, here, the words "assists in organizing," in their ordinary import, imply that organization has been effected, and that the accused assisted in accomplishing it. The statute does not say that it shall be an offense to assist in attempting to organize the kind of organizations, societies and assemblages denounced by the act, but that it shall be a crime to assist in organizing such proscribed organizations, societies, or assemblages.

The evidence before us, if tested by the foregoing definitions, must be held to be insufficient to support the implied finding that appellant assisted in organizing the Industrial Workers of the World, or any local thereof. Even if the publication and distribution of the printed propaganda had resulted in adding one or more members, such increment of membership would not have amounted to "organizing" the Industrial Workers of the World. Such increase of membership would not alone have sufficed to furnish the body of men known as the Industrial Workers of the World with organs—a president, secretary, treasurer, etc.—whereby it would be endowed with the capacity to function, particularly if it were already endowed with such functioning organ or media through which its purposes might be accomplished and its acts performed. But there is no evidence that the printed propaganda resulted in adding a single recruit to the cause for which appellant labored. Therefore, even if it were conceded that to succeed in inducing another actually to join the Industrial Workers of the World would alone be tantamount to "organizing" such an assemblage of men as the statute proscribes, still the mere distribution by an accused of literature or printed propaganda designed to induce others to join the organization, but which failed of its purpose, unaccompanied by any organizing efforts on the part of others, would not rise to the dignity of assisting in organizing the Industrial Workers of the World, or any local thereof. It might possibly amount to an attempt to organize; but one who merely publishes or distributes propaganda, there being no showing that his efforts have supplemented the organizing labors of others, does not thereby assist in actually effecting the organization of a body of men.

The judgment is reversed.

JOHNSON v. QUINBY. (Civ. 4064.)

Guaranty 🔑53(3) — Guarantor exonerated from liability because financial burden of principal was increased with creditor's consent.

Where the obligation of a lessee, which guarantor undertook to protect, covered the performance by lessee of the terms of a lease and payment of rents thereon, and a collateral agreement made to limit guarantor's liability and to afford a method of extinguishing his obligation was entered into on the understanding that lessee, in addition to obligations of her lease, was only undertaking to carry an indebtedness amounting not to exceed $10,000 for furnishing the house when lessor, without consent of the guarantor, consented to lessee's increasing the financial burden beyond the contemplated amount, guarantor was thereby exonerated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by G. Rupert Johnson against E. C. Quinby. From judgment for the defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Taylor & Forgy, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Eugene D. Williams, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This action involves the plaintiff's right to recover from defendant upon his written guaranty that Mrs. Church, as lessee of an apartment house owned by the plaintiff, would pay the rental reserved in the lease. The case was here on a former appeal from a judgment rendered in favor of the defendant. On that appeal the judgment was reversed. Johnson v. Quinby, 44 Cal. App. 699, 187 Pac. 172. After the former judgment in favor of the defendant had been reversed, the case was tried a second time, and judgment again rendered in favor of the defendant. From this judgment the plaintiff now appeals.

Since the former decision here the plaintiff filed an "amended supplemental complaint" showing the accrual of further rentals and a balance due to the plaintiff larger than the amount of the original demand. The defendant then filed a "second amended answer to the complaint and answer to amended supplemental complaint." On these pleadings the case was tried a second time.

In connection with the lease and guaranty a collateral agreement was made between the plaintiff, the defendant, and Mrs. Church, which recited that, whereas there was a contemplated purchase by the lessee from Barker Bros. of necessary furniture to furnish the leased apartment house, at a total price not to exceed $10,000, it was agreed that of this total purchase price one-half thereof, not to exceed $5,000, was to be advanced and paid by the lessor, for and on behalf of the lessee, who was to pay the remaining half of the purchase price to Barker Bros. in accordance with the terms of the agreement of purchase when made. It was further agreed that, when Barker Bros. were fully paid, the lessee should then commence the making of payments to the lessor in liquidation of the "other half" so advanced by him in payment for the furniture, and at the same time execute to the lessor a chattel mortgage thereon as security for the payment of such advancement, and also as security for the lessee's covenants in the lease, and that thereupon the defendant, as to any rents which might thereafter accrue, should be released from liability as guarantor.

In the former decision of this court it was held that the court erred in overruling the plaintiff's demurrer to the answer of the defendant: it being the opinion of the judges that those portions of the answer which were there considered and discussed did not state any valid defense to the plaintiff's cause of action. Those parts of the complaint were designated as the fourth defense and the third defense. The said fourth defense has become the third defense of the second amended answer. It is conceded by counsel for respondent that the changes which have been made in the allegations of this defense as stated in the answer are not sufficient to relieve it from the effect of the former decision. Respondent now relies solely upon the second defense of his second amended answer, which is an amended statement with some additional facts of the matters which were discussed as "the third defense" in said former decision of this court. In that decision the court said:

> "By the third defense, after setting forth the guaranty and collateral agreement, it is alleged that, after the execution thereof, 'the said lessee purchased furniture at a price greatly in excess of the sum of $10,000, to wit, at a price of about $13,700, which said purchase was made without the knowledge or consent of defendant; that thereafter, within a period of some three or four months, the plaintiff, well knowing that the total purchase price of said furniture had exceeded by a large amount the sum of $10,000, to which it was limited in the agreement heretofore set forth, and consenting thereto, paid to Barker Bros. on account of the purchase price of said furniture, the sum of $5,000.' That the effect of such acts on the part of plaintiff was detrimental to defendant in this, 'that it became necessary for said lessee to pay to Barker Brothers the sum of about $8,700, instead of the sum of $5,000, which the agreement provided, before the defendant could be released from his obligation as guarantor under the said guaranty.' A general demurrer was likewise interposed to this defense and by the court overruled. Section 2819 of the Civil Code provides that 'A guarantor is exonerated, * * * if by any act of the creditor, without the consent of the guarantor, the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect.' And in County of Glenn v. Jones, 146 Cal. 518 (2 Ann. Cas. 764, 80 Pac. 695), it is said: 'The contract of suretyship imports entire good faith and confidence between the parties as to the whole transaction. The creditor is bound to observe good faith with the surety. He must withhold nothing, conceal nothing, release nothing which will possibly benefit the surety. He must not do any act injurious to the surety or inconsistent with his rights.' Conceding that the lessee's act in buying furniture at a price in excess of that authorized by the agreement was a violation of its terms, nevertheless we are at a loss to perceive how plaintiff's act, in compliance with the terms of the agreement on his part, was detrimental to the interest of the defendant. There is no allegation that plaintiff aided, assisted, advised, or participated in the alleged wrongful act of the lessee. Assuming for the purpose of this case only that the recitals, 'well knowing,' and 'consenting,' are equivalent to direct allegations, the allegation is that such knowledge was not acquired and such consent given until three or four months after the purchase was made. Moreover, it is not alleged the lessee failed to pay Barker Bros. the sum of five thousand dollars, which under the terms of the agreement she was to pay before the execution of the mortgage provided therein as a release of defendant's liability. Indeed, for aught that appears to the contrary, she may have paid the entire balance of $8,700. While a guarantor's contract must be construed strictly as against the creditor, and any agreement made by him with the principal debtor, the effect of which is to alter or change the contract, will exonerate the surety, nevertheless, in the absence of facts showing that the lessee, due to some act of plaintiff, was in default to Barker Bros., the pleading is not sufficient to constitute a defense, in that it fails to show any act of plaintiff changing or altering the contract.

For the purpose of restating this defense so as to avoid the defects pointed out in the foregoing paragraph hereof, the defendant in his second amended answer alleged that, after the execution of the "agreement collateral to lease and guaranty," and prior to the accrual of any of the rents mentioned in the complaint or amended supplemental complaint, the plaintiff and Mrs. Church made an agreement with Barker Bros. whereby it was agreed that Barker Bros. should sell to Mrs. Church furniture for the said apartments, and that the purchase price thereof should be in excess of $10,000 to wit, that the same might exceed the said sum of $10,000 to the extent of $2,000, and that the plaintiff would pay to Barker Bros. on account of the purchase price thereof the sum of $5,000, and no more; that the balance of said purchase price should be represented by a chattel mortgage upon the said furniture, and should be paid by Mrs. Church; that thereafter, and prior to the accrual of any of said rents, the lessee purchased from Barker Bros. furniture for said apartment house at a price of approximately $13,700, and that the said purchase was made with the full knowledge and consent of the plaintiff, who aided, assisted, and advised Mrs. Church in making the said purchase for the said sum, and participated therein; that the defendant had no knowledge of the making of said agreement between the plaintiff and Mrs. Church and Barker Bros. whereby it was agreed that the purchase price of said furniture should exceed the sum of $10,000, and defendant had no knowledge of the purchase of said furniture for a price in excess of $10,000, and did not consent to said agreement or to said purchase at said price; that, after the purchase of said furniture, and within a period of three or four months, the plaintiff, who then and there knew that the total purchase of said furniture had exceeded by a large amount the sum of $10,000 to which it was limited in the agreement hereinbefore referred to, and who had participated in the purchase thereof at a price in excess of $10,000, did pay to Barker Bros. on account of the purchase price of said furniture the sum of $5,000, and that Mrs. Church has not paid to Barker Bros. on account of the purchase price of said furniture any sum in addition to the sum so paid by the plaintiff except the sum of $4,000.

The findings of the court affirm that the foregoing allegations are true. The court affirmed, and determined that, by reason of said acts of the lessor and lessee, which were done without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, the defendant's liability under said lease was extended beyond the amount and beyond the time to which it was limited by said guaranty and collateral agreement in this, that it became necessary for the lessee to pay to Barker Bros. the sum of $8,700, instead of the sum of $5,000, which the agreement provided, before the defendant could be released from his obligation as guarantor.

Appellant contends that these findings are not sustained by the evidence. We think that he has only shown that there was a conflict in the evidence, but that there is evidence sufficient to sustain the findings. According to the testimony of Mrs. Church, the representative of Barker Bros., when they were negotiating for the furniture, expressed the opinion that the amount to be used in furnishing the house ought to be $12,000. Thereupon she asked the lessor if that would be all right, to which he replied, "Well, I would try not to make it more than $12,000—to keep within the $12,000 if I could." The evidence clearly shows that the lessor took part in the negotiations for the purchase of the furniture, and that the purchase was consummated with his co-operation and consent as a party thereto for the furnishing of the house at a cost of $12,000, if not more, and that it was on that contract of purchase that the lessor agreed to pay and did pay the sum of $5,000 as an advancement thereon for the benefit of the lessee. It was by reason of his consent that the lessee was able to purchase furniture in excess of $10,000.

It only remains to determine whether by reason of these acts of the creditor (the lessor) which were without the consent of the guarantor the obligation of the principal (the lessee) to the creditor, as contemplated in the contract of guaranty, was altered in any respect. If it was so altered, then the guarantor is exonerated. The obligation of the lessee which the guarantor undertook to protect covered the performance by the lessee of all of the terms, conditions, and covenants of the lessee on her part to be performed, and particularly the full payment when due of all rents provided for in said lease. The collateral agreement made for the purpose of limiting the liability of the guarantor and affording a method of extinguishing his obligation was made contemporaneously with the guaranty, and as a part of the same transaction. It was entered into upon the stated understanding that the lessee, in addition to the obligations of her lease, was only undertaking to carry a burden of indebtedness amounting to not exceeding $10,000 for furnishing the house. If the lessor advanced and paid on account of the so limited purchase price "one-half thereof, not exceeding $5,000," then the lessee would have to pay not more than $5,000 to Barker Bros. in order to obtain title to the furniture, and thereby become able to execute her chattel mortgage to the lessor; whereupon it was agreed that the guarantor would be released from further liability. But the acts of the lessor and the lessee increased the financial burden of the lessee substantially beyond that contemplated in the agreements to which the guarantor was a party, and beyond the limitations of liability upon which it clearly appears that he relied. Unquestionably, by the modified arrangement agreed to between the lessee and the lessor, the time within which she would be able to acquire title to the furniture and execute her chattel mortgage to the lessor would be extended unless her financial resources had enabled her, at the time of making the purchase, to pay all of the purchase price of the furniture over and above the said limit of $10,000. Instead of that, it appears that, even at the time of the second trial of this action, her payments on the furniture account amounted to only $4,000. We are therefore of the opinion that the guarantor is exonerated from his liability.

PEOPLE v. HANSEN. (Cr. 963.)

1. Criminal law 🔑398(2)—Where record owner testified he had not alienated land since acquiring record title, such title could be proved from county records.

In a prosecution for forging a deed with intent to defraud one K., ownership of the land by K. could be proved by the county records without the original deeds, where K. testified that he had not alienated the land since the record showed he acquired it.

2. Criminal law 🔑370, 371(5)—Proof of later forgery held admissible.

The intent to defraud and knowledge that the instrument was forged being necessary to conviction of forgery of deed, in addition to the mere proof of commission of the act, evidence of a defendant's later similar forgery is admissible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Samuel Hansen was convicted of forgery, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and from order denying his motion for new trial. Affirmed.

Cooper, Collings & Shreve, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. This is an appeal from a judgment and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The defendant was charged with the crime of forgery by an information containing two counts. The first count alleges that the defendant did make, utter, forge, and counterfeit a deed dated September 18, 1919, to a certain piece of land in Orange county, with intent to defraud one T. R. Kinmounth. By the second count the same charge is made, except that the deed said to have been forged is dated October 15, 1919.

On the trial T. R. Kinmounth was called as a witness and testified that he was the owner of the property described in the deeds set up in the information, having received title thereto from the estate of one Murphy in 1890, and that he had paid all taxes ever since that date; that he was a nonresident of California and had not been in this state for more than 30 years; that he had never signed a deed of this property to Samuel Hansen and did not know the latter; that he was a married man, although both of the deeds recited the fact that he was single. It was shown that the purported deeds as set out in the information from Kinmounth to Hansen appeared to be acknowledged before a notary public named Cora E. Moore; that they were recorded in the office of the county recorder of Orange county, and this fact was established by the introduction of the records. It was further proved that there never had been such a notary public as C. E. Moore holding a license from the state of California for Orange county; that after said deeds were recorded the defendant conveyed the property to one McDuffie.

[1] On behalf of the defendant several witnesses testified that a person named Kinmounth had executed deeds of the land in question to the defendant. It is claimed by appellant that the court erred in permitting proof of ownership by the county records without a foundation, and that the best and only competent evidence would have been the original deeds. To support this contention we are referred to People v. Strassman, 112 Cal. 687, 45 Pac. 3. In that case a record title was shown in the complaining witness, but there was no evidence to prove that between the date thereof and the filing of the information title had not passed to some one else. The intervening period was about a year. The court there held that the presumption of the continuance of title in the person in whom it was shown to exist by the record at the date of recordation must give way to the presumption of innocence. In the instant case the prosecution has not relied upon the presumption of the continuance of title in Kinmounth since the record shows that he acquired the same. Kinmounth himself testified that he had not alienated it. This evidence was competent. Section 1951, Code Civ. Proc.

[2] Appellant contends that error was committed in the reception of evidence in another particular. The prosecution introduced evidence to show that about eight months after the alleged commission of the offenses charged in the information, the defendant committed a similar offense in that he made, executed, and delivered a forged deed of real property purporting to be from a nonresident named Walters, and the acknowledgment to which was also represented as being before a notary public who was shown to have been fictitious.

The instant case is of the type where proof of other offenses may appropriately be admitted. One of the elements of the crime of forgery necessary to be established is the intent to defraud, prejudice, and damage some person. Another is knowledge of the defendant that the instrument in question was forged. The nature of the transaction is not such that proof of the commission of the acts necessarily involves a conclusive implication of guilty knowledge or intent. The defendant might have been honestly mistaken and in good faith have received a deed from some person calling himself Kinmounth and have innocently recorded it and subsequently alienated the land to another. If this were true, there could have been no intent to defraud the real owner of the property. But proof of the fact that the defendant passed or uttered another forged deed under similar conditions establishes a logical inference that guilty knowledge and intent to defraud accompanied the criminal acts otherwise shown which constitute the body of the offense.

We conclude, therefore, that the court did not err in the particular specified by appellant in receiving evidence. From an examination of the transcript and considering the facts before stated as established, we are satisfied that the evidence is sufficient to warrant the verdict of guilty returned by the jury.

62 Cal. App. 222

PEOPLE v. ANDERSON. (Cr. 907.)

1. Bribery 🔑3—Defendant in bribery prosecution held not to be in position to dispute fact of indictment against person arrested by him.

In a prosecution for bribery, where evidence showed that defendant as a detective in the employ of a county, with another, assumed the existence of an indictment in a foreign state against one arrested by them, and under that pretense secured $10,000 from the wife of the one arrested to influence their official action, defendant cannot dispute the fact that the indictment had been returned and was pending.

2. Bribery 🔑11—Inference held warranted that defendant regarded himself as acting deputy sheriff and his acts as official.

In a prosecution for bribery, inference held warranted from evidence that defendant intended his acts, in accompanying another detective and assisting him in arrest of one indicted in a foreign state, to be regarded as official, and that defendant considered that throughout the transaction he was acting as deputy sheriff.

3. Bribery 🔑11—Evidence connected defendant with offense and justified conclusion that he acted knowingly.

In a prosecution for bribery, evidence of trips taken by defendant and another detective in negotiating with wife of one indicted in a foreign state for bribe money and securing it held sufficient to connect defendant with the offense.

4. Bribery 🔑11—That criminal intent of defendant was connected with offense by more indirect evidence than that of coindictee held immaterial.

In a prosecution for bribery, where two detectives employed by a county accepted a bribe for permitting the escape of one arrested by them charged with crime in a foreign state, it was immaterial that the element of criminal intent of defendant was established by more indirect evidence than was that of his coindictee.

5. Bribery 🔑1(2)—Arrest of victim held a "matter then pending," regardless of indictment.

Where defendant and another detective employed by a county arrested one indicted for grand larceny in Texas and then permitted him to escape on payment of $10,000 made by their victim's wife, for the purpose of prosecution the matter of their victim's arrest was a "matter then pending," regardless of the actual existence of an indictment against him in Texas.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

W. J. Anderson was convicted of bribery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Michael F. Shannon and Thomas A. Wood, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Lorrin Andrews, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CRAIG, J. Appellant was indicted, together with one Lips, for the crimes of bribery and extortion. The count charging extortion was dismissed, and after trial the defendant was found guilty by a jury of the crime of bribery. From the judgment pronounced upon this conviction and a denial of the defendant's motion for a new trial this appeal was taken. Anderson and Lips were detectives in the employ of the county of Los Angeles. The indictment charged that one L. M. Furay had been indicted for grand larceny in the state of Texas; that Lips and Anderson arrested him in Los Angeles county and then allowed him to escape in consideration of a payment of $10,000 made to the officers by Mrs. Furay. The testimony admitted was amply sufficient to sustain these allegations. Upon similar evidence introduced in the case of People v. Lips it was held in the decision upon appeal (Cal. App.) 211 Pac. 22, that the record established a case of bribery under the provisions of section 68 of the Penal Code, which denounces agreements by an officer to receive a bribe "upon any agreement * * * that his vote, opinion, or action upon any matter then pending" before him shall be influenced thereby.

[1] In the instant case the principal reason urged for a reversal is that the trial court permitted the prosecution to place in evidence a purported copy of an indictment against Furay in the county of Tarrant, Texas, charging him with the crime of grand larceny. It is insisted that a proper foundation was not laid for the introduction of this document. Section 1905 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that—

> A judicial record of a sister state may be proved "by the attestation of the clerk and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a clerk and seal, together with a certificate of the chief judge or presiding magistrate, that the attestation is in due form."

The foundation laid by the prosecuting attorney for the introduction of this indictment failed to set forth that the attestation thereto was in due form.

We are of the opinion that the defendant is in no position to dispute the fact that the indictment had been returned and was pending. The evidence shows that he, together with Lips, assumed the existence of an indictment against Furay, and under that pretension secured $10,000 from Mrs. Furay to influence their official action. The Court of Appeals of Texas in deciding a similar case said:

"It is insisted by counsel for defendant that the arrest and custody of John Gable by the defendant was without authority of law, and that, therefore, it was no offense for the defendant to accept a bribe to release him. We do not so understand the law. It was by virtue of his official authority that the defendant arrested and held John Gable. It matters not whether the arrest and custody were legal or illegal; the said Gable was a prisoner in the custody of the defendant, a peace officer, and was permitted by the defendant to escape, in consideration of money paid him to effect such escape. We are of the opinion that, in a prosecution for this offense, it is not permissible for the defendant to question the legality of his custody of the prisoner." Moseley v. State, 25 Tex. App. 515, 8 S. W. 652.

While the point presented by appellant was not expressly decided in its companion case (People v. Lips), one of similar import was passed upon. It was there held that the fact that Lips and Anderson had no actual authority to arrest Furay was unimportant. No warrant of arrest was placed in their hands or was issued. It was there indicated that the following quotation from 4 Ruling Case Law, 183, par. 13, is a substantial statement of the law:

> "The giving or receiving of money * * * for the purpose of influencing official conduct is not deprived of its criminal character by the fact that the action contemplated is not within the officer's jurisdiction. If he acts in his official capacity—and by this term is meant the doing of such acts as properly belong to the office and are intended by the officer to be official—the offense is complete."

And, further, the opinion reads:

> "So it is here. Appellant had been instructed by his superior to locate and apprehend Furay, and without doubt he believed that he was acting officially as a deputy sheriff in all that pertained to his activities under the directions of that superior. His action in agreeing to release Furay was corrupt in the last degree, and we find no difficulty under the law in determining that his illicit conduct related to a matter 'pending before him' in his official capacity."

[2] Appellant calls attention to evidence indicating that he was never directly instructed by his superior officer to apprehend Furay. Regardless of this, the inference was amply warranted that he intended his acts in accompanying Lips and assisting him to be regarded as official and that he himself considered that throughout the transaction he was acting as a deputy sheriff.

[3] If it be intended, in referring to Anderson's testimony to the effect that he did not know of the reasons for the trips that were taken in negotiating with Mrs. Furay for the money and securing it, and the other evidence which might indicate that he had no official part in the matter, to maintain that the evidence is insufficient to connect him with the offense, we must disagree with appellant's counsel. Mrs. Furay testified that she stated to Anderson that she thought it was awful "to take that money away from the boy, because it meant everything to him," and he replied, "Yes; but it is the best way to fix it." From this evidence and the appellant's conduct in assisting Lips throughout, the jury were justified in concluding that Anderson acted knowingly. If so, the facts in the instant case did not differ in any material respect from those presented against Lips.

[4] It is immaterial that the element of criminal intent on the part of Anderson was established by more indirect evidence than was that of Lips. Anderson's connection with this offense of bribery was established. He was shown to have agreed, for a corrupt consideration, to allow Furay to escape from the custody of the state whose authority he and Lips purported to represent.

[5] We think that for the the purpose of this prosecution the matter of Furay's arrest was a "matter then pending," regardless of the actual existence of an indictment against him in Texas.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. NORMAN et al. (Cr. 950.)

Criminal law ⟹1167(3)—Error in not formally granting motion to set aside information held without prejudice.

Since the effect of an order directing transmittal of papers to the committing magistrate directing that he legally commit defendants charged with operating an automobile on the public highway without the owner's consent was the same as though the information had been set aside and the matter resubmitted to the magistrate, error in not formally granting motion to set aside the first information did not result prejudicially to defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Aubrey Norman and another were convicted of operating an automobile without the owner's consent, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Edward J. Kelly, of San Diego, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Lorrin Andrews, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CRAIG, J. The defendants were convicted of operating an automobile upon the public highways without the owner's consent, a felony. The court denied their motion for a new trial and pronounced judgment, from which this appeal was taken. The ground urged for reversal is that the defendants were not legally committed by a magistrate.

The proceedings upon which they rely are as follows: The prosecution was begun in the usual manner and after a preliminary examination before a magistrate the defendants were held to answer for "driving an automobile without the owner's consent." An information was filed by the district attorney charging the defendants with a felony, to wit, operating an automobile upon the public highways without the owner's consent. Defendants were arraigned in the superior court and moved to set aside the information on the ground that they were not legally committed by a magistrate. The court denied the motion, expressing an opinion that the magistrate should amend the commitment, and thereafter made an order directing the clerk to transmit the papers in the case to the committing magistrate, and that the justice be directed to correct the commitment and recertify it to the superior court. Thereupon the committing magistrate signed a new commitment, holding the defendants to answer for operating an automobile upon the public highways without the owner's consent. In due time the defendants were again arraigned and moved to set the information aside upon the same grounds as before. This motion was denied. A plea of not guilty was entered and after a trial the defendants were convicted.

It is urged that under the first commitment the defendants were held to answer for a misdemeanor. Our attention is called to section 499 b of the Penal Code, which makes it a misdemeanor for a person "without the permission of the owner" to "take any automobile * * * for the purpose of temporarily using or operating the same." Section 28 of the Motor Vehicle Law (St. 1915, p. 397), as amended in 1917 by section 21 thereof, provides that "it shall be unlawful for any person to drive or operate * * * upon the public highway any motor vehicle not his own, whether with or without intent to steal the same, in the absence of the owner thereof and without such owner's consent," and makes a violation of this provision a felony. Appellant argues that since the words "public highways" were omitted from the first commitment, the defendants were thereby held to answer only for the misdemeanor denounced in section 499 b of the Penal Code; further, that all that followed in the superior court and the subsequent commitment by the justice of the peace were without jurisdiction.

It cannot be said that the first commitment held the defendants to answer under section 499 b. That provision does not denounce the driving of an automobile on the public highways or elsewhere. It makes only the taking of an automobile under the circumstances therein described an offense; it is obvious that to take a vehicle is quite different from driving or operating it.

On the other hand, this commitment did not completely and regularly state the offense named in the Motor Vehicle Act, since, as pointed out by the appellants, it did not allege that they drove the automobile in question upon the public highways. However, it is quite evident that the magistrate attempted to commit the defendants for a violation of section 21 of that act, and the superior court so construed the commitment. It is true that the order made was that the motion to set aside the information be denied. Nevertheless, the court further directed that the commitment be sent back and that the magistrate make out another. This was done and a new or amended information filed. The original commitment charged no offense. This resulted from the technical omission of the words "upon the public highways." The superior court had full authority to set aside the first information. It also could have returned the commitment to the magistrate for recommitment, and this it did. Sec. 997, Pen. Code; Ex parte Fowler, 5 Cal. App. 549, at page 554, 90 Pac. 958. The effect of the entire procedure in that court was the same as though the order upon the first motion to set aside the information had been that the same be set aside and that the matter be resubmitted to the magistrate. Had this order been made the omission in the original commitment which produced the irregularity could have been cured by the magistrate merely making out a new one, as was done, without a second examination and again taking testimony. Ex parte Fowler, supra. In that case it is said that the omission of the words "with malice aforethought," necessary to a complete description of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder, amounts to a mere irregularity and one which the magistrate could correct upon being ordered to do so by the superior court.

We have examined the entire transcript and are satisfied therefrom that the appellants were clearly shown to have been guilty of the offenses for which they were sentenced. In view of the entire proceedings, the error of the superior court in not formally granting the motion to set aside the first information could not have resulted prejudicially to the rights of the defendants, nor has the judgment appealed from produced a miscarriage of justice.

Under such circumstances the judgment should be affirmed (article 6, § 4½, Const. of Cal.); and it is so ordered.

BOSSEN v. BEAN. (Civ. 2618.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 24, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑518(4)—Judgment roll held incomplete in absence of amended answer.

Where demurrer to an answer was sustained and an amended answer filed on which the case was tried, the original answer passed out of the case and could not be considered for any purpose, and where appeal was on the judgment roll alone, in the absence of such amended answer, the judgment roll is not complete.

2. Appeal and error 🔑635(1)—Appeal dismissed for failure to comply with rule as to transcript.

Where the record contains no copy of the pleadings upon which findings were made and the judgment entered, it cannot be said that a transcript has been furnished, and, under rule 2 (176 Pac. vii), the appeal may properly be dismissed.

3. Pleading 🔑418(3)—Filing amended answer and going to trial waived error in sustaining demurrer to original answer.

Any error in sustaining demurrer, or striking out portions of the first amended answer, was waived by the filing of a second amended answer and going to trial on the issue raised thereby.

4. Appeal and error 🔑518(6)—Notice of motion to strike pleadings not considered on appeal on judgment roll alone.

A notice of motion to strike out parts of pleadings, not being a part of the judgment roll, cannot be considered in the absence of a bill of exceptions.

5. Appeal and error 🔑680(2)—Trial court not put in error in sustaining demurrer to pleading where appellate court not apprised of contents thereof.

The trial court cannot be put in error for sustaining demurrer to pleadings when the appellate court is not apprised of its contents.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by William H. Bossen against F. E. Bean. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur Bundy and W. P. Rich, both of Marysville, for appellant.

J. E. Ebert, of Marysville, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. [1] The appeal is from the judgment and purports to be upon the judgment roll, but the judgment roll is not complete since it does not contain the second amended answer, one of the pleadings upon which the parties went to trial. Indeed, said answer does not appear in the transcript at all, and there has been no suggestion of diminution of the record. The action was brought to recover the possession of a certain number of cattle, or their value in case delivery could not be had. The original answer and the first amended answer are printed in the transcript, from which it appears that defendant admitted the ownership of plaintiff, but claimed the right to the possession of the cattle by virtue of the assignment of a chattel mortgage, of a judgment for a certain amount, and of a claim for pasturage. Plaintiff demurred to each of said answers on various grounds and also moved to strike out certain portions thereof. The motion was granted, and the demurrer in each instance was sustained. Instead of relying upon his first amended answer, appellant chose to file another pleading, and hence this second amended answer and the complaint are the only pleadings that could be considered by this court (Colton Land & Water Co. v. Swartz, 99 Cal. 278, 33 Pac. 878; Bray v. Lowery, 163 Cal. 256, 124 Pac. 1004); but, of course, we cannot consider this second amended answer, because we do not know its character or contents.

[2] Indeed, since the record does not contain a copy of the pleadings upon which the findings were made and the judgment entered, it cannot be said that we have been furnished with a transcript, and, under rule 2 (176 Pac. vii), and the decisions of the Supreme Court it would seem proper to dismiss the appeal. Hart v. Plum, 14 Cal. 148; S. F. & N. P. R. Co. v. Anderson, 77 Cal. 297, 19 Pac. 517.

[3] Moreover, if there was any error in sustaining the demurrer or in striking out portions of the first amended answer, it was waived by the filing of the second amended answer and going to trial upon the issue raised thereby. Ganceart v. Henry, 98 Cal. 281, 33 Pac. 92; Brittan v. Oakland Bk. of Savings, 112 Cal. 1, 44 Pac. 339.

[4] In addition, as to the motion to strike out, it is impossible to determine from the printed record what portions were stricken out, since the notice of motion designated the portions by page and line of the amended answer as filed and not as printed, and there is no bill of exceptions in the case. Besides, the notice of motion is no part of the judgment roll, and we cannot consider it in the absence of a bill of exceptions. Brown v. Canty, 31 Cal. App. 183, 159 Pac. 1056; Overton v. Noyes, 177 Cal. 450, 170 Pac. 1110.

[5] It is incumbent, of course, upon appellant to show prejudicial error to justify a reversal of the judgment, and assuming, for the sake of argument, that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer, we cannot say that it was prejudicial when we are not apprised of the contents of the second amended answer and of the evidence upon which the case was tried. We may add, though, that an examination of said first amended answer and the demurrer thereto convinces us that the trial court was right in the ruling.

No motion has been made to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the transcript is imperfect; but, at any rate, since no error has been shown, the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

GULART v. AZEVEDO. (Civ. 2600.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 4, 1923. Rehearing Denied June 2, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 3, 1923.)

1. Brokers 🔑54—Subsequent expression of willingness by purchaser does not entitle broker to commission.

Where the listing agreement entitled a broker to his commission only if he negotiated a binding contract for the sale, and the contract negotiated by him, through his mistake, was not binding, an expression of willingness by the purchaser to abide by the contract under the conditions as they actually existed, which was not made or communicated to the owner until after the expiration of the period during which the broker had the right to make the sale, did not entitle him to his commission.

2. Brokers 🔑49(1)—Listing contract held to require brokers to procure binding contract.

A listing contract giving a broker the sole and exclusive agency of the property, and authorizing him to sell and convey and contract with the purchaser for the conveyance of the title, appointed the broker defendant's agent to execute a binding contract of the sale, rather than merely to find a purchaser with whom defendant might so contract, and therefore did not entitle the broker to his commission upon his producing a purchaser ready and willing and able to buy on the specified terms, unless he actually procured an enforceable contract.

3. Brokers 🔑49(3) — Contract to purchase subject to mortgage does not bind purchaser to take under executory contract of sale.

A contract negotiated by a broker whereby the purchaser agreed to take the property subject to a mortgage for $17,000 does not bind the purchaser to take the property when it appeared the title was held under an executory contract of sale on which there was a balance due of $17,000, since the rights of a mortgagor and those of a purchaser, under a contract of purchase, are essentially different.

4. Evidence 🔑265(14)—Admissions based on incorrect information are of no weight.

Admissions made by an owner that he owed a broker's commission, which were based upon misinformation by the broker that he had sold the property in accordance with the terms of the listing contract, are of no weight when it appears that the contract negotiated by the broker was not in accordance with those terms.

5. Brokers 🔑63(1)—Stating ground of refusal does not waive other grounds then unknown.

The fact that the owner, when he refused to execute the conveyance to the purchaser procured by the broker, gave as his sole ground for such refusal the refusal of his wife to join in the conveyance did not waive his right to object later that the terms of the contract were not in accordance with the listing contract where he did not have knowledge of that fact at the time he refused to execute the conveyance.

On Petition for Rehearing.

6. Brokers 🔑49(3)—Broker held not entitled to claim that he understood that "incumbrance" referred to in listing contract was mortgage.

A broker cannot claim that the word "incumbrance" as used in the listing contract was understood to mean a mortgage, and that he was led so to believe by the owner's statement at the time the contract was executed, where plaintiff alleged and the court found on sufficient evidence that at the time the listing contract was executed the legal title was vested in others subject to an agreement by the owner to purchase, and that at the time of the execution of the listing it was the understanding of the parties that the purchaser should assume the incumbrance owed by defendant on the land under the contract.

7. Principal and agent 🔑103(10)—Power of attorney held not to authorize change in terms given to exclusive agent to sell.

Where a landowner before leaving the country listed his property with plaintiff as an exclusive agent to contract for the sale thereof on specified terms, a power of attorney executed by him to another giving the other authority to convey real property and to execute all necessary and proper conveyances, and to receive payment therefor, did not authorize the attorney to bind the owner to an acceptance of terms different from those stated in the listing contract.

8. Pleading 🔑129(2)—Answer held sufficiently to deny broker procured agreement.

In an action for a broker's commission, an answer denying that the purchaser procured by the broker offered to purchase the premises as alleged in the complaint, and alleging that plaintiff did not procure a purchaser ready and willing and able to purchase the real estate upon the terms therein described, did not admit that the purchaser procured was ready, willing, and able to buy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by John Gulart against Joaquin B. Azevedo, to recover a commission for sale of real property. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hawkins & Hawkins and L. E. Jones, all of Modesto, and Rose, Silverstein & Collier, of Oakland, for appellant.

Whitehurst & Logan, of Patterson, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff was given judgment for $3,500, with interest thereon, alleged to be due as commissions for the sale of defendant's land. The defendant's motion for a new trial was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment.

The court found that on the 24th day of May, 1919, the defendant executed and delivered to plaintiff a writing containing the following provisions:

> "I have this day placed with John Gulart for sale the property described on the reverse side of this card, of which I am the owner. The said John Gulart shall have the sole and exclusive agency of the property for nine months from date hereof, and I authorize him to sell and convey, and contract with the purchaser for the sale and conveyance by good and sufficient title to said property, according to the prices and terms of payment herein specified. * * * Price of property to be $30,000 net. If the said property be sold or disposed of during the period above stated * * * I agree to pay John Gulart a commission as follows: All over and above $30,000 when sale is complete. * * * Terms: All cash, or $13,000 cash and balance to be incumbrance paid in 8 years from date of sale. Notes to bear interest at 6 per cent."

After the execution of the contract and before any purchaser was found by plaintiff the defendant went to the Azores Islands, where he remained until after this action was commenced. Before so departing, the defendant duly appointed F. P. Gomez, Jr., his attorney in fact, "with full power and authority to convey real property and interests therein * * * and to accept and receive payment therefor," and informed plaintiff that Gomez "was going to attend to his business" during his absence.

On the 15th day of November, 1919, plaintiff, in the name of and as the agent of defendant, entered into an agreement with Mike and George Sequeria for the sale of the land to them, and containing, among other terms, the following:

> "Whereas, there is a mortgage lien standing of record against said property in the sum of $17,000, * * * the party of the first part agrees to sell said 60-acre ranch above mentioned to the parties of the second part for the sum of $16,500 cash, and the assuming of said mortgage by said parties of the second part, and the parties of the second part agree to buy said property and pay $16,500.00 cash therefor, and to assume and pay when due said mortgage of $17,000.00, and said Mike Sequeria has this day paid to said John Gulart, agent as aforesaid, the sum of $1,000.00, which sum shall be held by said agent, and at the time of consummating said transfer said sum shall be applied on the cash purchase price."

The sum of $1,000 was paid to plaintiff in accordance with the terms of the agreement.

Immediately after the execution of the agreement with the Sequerias plaintiff exhibited the same, together with the listing contract, to Gomez, and told him that he "had got the Sequerias as purchasers, and that they were willing to buy the place according to the contract with Azevedo," although neither the plaintiff nor the Sequerias then knew the nature of defendant's title. Plaintiff asked Gomez at that time to execute a deed, as defendant's attorney in fact, conveying the land to the Sequerias upon their compliance with the terms of their agreement. Gomez "said it was all right," but declined to make a conveyance on the ground that "he would like to take it up with Mr. Azevedo first." but stated that he would cable defendant regarding the matter, and "ask him if it was satisfactory." Plaintiff later cabled the defendant as follows:

> "I sold your ranch per contract. Approve sale by cablegram at once at my expense."

Having received no reply to the cablegram, the plaintiff, on January 17, 1920, wrote defendants, saying:

> "I have sold your ranch on the following terms per your contract; $13,000.00 cash to you and purchasers will assume contract," and inclosing draft of a quitclaim deed to be executed by defendant and his wife and then forward it to a local bank, with instructions to deliver the same upon receipt of $13,000. Under date of February 14, 1920, defendant wrote plaintiff as follows:

> "We have been visiting for a few months in Terciara. When we returned we found the papers and telegram waiting us at the post office. I am sending you the paper back as my wife does not want to sign; without her signing nothing else can be done."

Plaintiff testified that it takes a letter 15 days or more to reach here from the Azores, and it follows that he could not have received defendant's letter prior to the expiration of his agency.

[1] Shortly after the execution of the agreement with the Sequerias the plaintiff discovered that there was not a mortgage on the land, but that defendant held the property under a contract of purchase from F. T. and V. T. Freitas, in whom the legal title was vested, and that there remained unpaid on the contract price the sum of $17,000, bearing interest at 6 per cent. per annum, the indebtedness being payable in full in about 8 years after the date of the listing contract. Plaintiff immediately informed the Sequerias of these facts, but no change was made in the agreement, and the evidence does not show that they offered or agreed, during the life of the listing contract, to purchase the property on the terms therein stated, or on any terms other than those contained in their written agreement, or that, during said time, they ever expressed to plaintiff, or to any other person, a willingness, even, to take the property and assume payment of defendant's indebtedness to Freitas brothers. One of the Sequerias testified that they were in fact willing to so take the property, but he did not say that such willingness was made known to any one. Of course, an undisclosed mental attitude can never constitute the basis of a contractual obligation. After the expiration of the period during which plaintiff was authorized to sell the property, the Sequerias offered to purchase the same and assume payment of the indebtedness to Freitas brothers, and indorsed on their written agreement an extension of defendant's time to make the transfer; but defendant had nothing to do with securing such extension, nor did he do anything which would make him a party thereto. No offer by the Sequerias or agreement between them and plaintiff, made after the expiration of the latter's authorization to sell, was binding upon defendant. As stated, plaintiff wrote defendant that the Sequerias had agreed to purchase the land and pay the balance due Freitas brothers. The latter part of the statement, however, was contrary to the fact. From what has been said it is apparent that plaintiff was not entitled to judgment on the theory that he had procured a purchaser who was ready, willing, and able to buy on the authorized terms, even if it be conceded that, under the listing contract, he would have earned a commission by merely finding such a purchaser and introducing him to defendant, and his right to a judgment, if any, must be founded on his written agreement with the Sequerias.

The complaint alleges, and the court finds, that, at the time the listing contract was executed, it was the understanding of the parties that, if the purchase price was not all paid in cash, the purchaser should assume and pay the balance owing from defendant to Freitas brothers. Plaintiff did not himself so understand, but one of his employees, who procured the contract from defendant, understood the meaning thereof to be as alleged and found, and he so testified at the trial. Appellant contends that this finding is not supported by the evidence. In view of the conclusion reached on other questions, the point so made need not be decided.

[2] The listing contract was not a mere authorization to procure a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy, but the plaintiff was employed to "contract with the purchaser for the sale and conveyance" of the land. The plaintiff was appointed defendant's agent to execute a binding contract for the sale of the property, rather than to find a purchaser with whom the defendant might so contract. The fact that the defendant was about to depart on an extended trip abroad, during which it would be impracticable for him to negotiate directly with a prospective purchaser, and the fact that plaintiff attempted to make a binding contract of sale, throw light upon the intention of the parties.

> "A broker employed to sell real estate may be authorized and required by the terms of his undertaking, not only to find a purchaser, but even to conclude an actual transfer, or at least to procure from the purchaser a valid written agreement binding him to purchase upon the terms specified; and where this is his undertaking the broker has not earned his commission until he has performed it or the principal has accepted a less complete performance." Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) § 2428.

In Cunningham v. Friendly, 70 Or. 222, 139 Pac. 928, opinion on rehearing 140 Pac. 989, the contract under consideration provided:

> "We hereby appoint you exclusive agent to make sale of the real property herein described. * * * And you are hereby authorized to accept a deposit to be applied on the purchase price, and to execute a binding contract for sale on our behalf."

The court said:

> "The plaintiff was not employed to find a purchaser for the lots and to bring the purchaser and seller together. * * * Plaintiff relies upon the fact that he brought Rocky and Friendly together, but that does not bring plaintiff within his contract to sell."

See, also, Bacon v. Davis, 9 Cal. App. 83 98 Pac. 71; Pfanz v. Humburg, 82 Ohio St. 1, 91 N. E. 863, 29 L. R. A. [N. S.] 533; Wiggins v. Wilson, 55 Fla. 346, 45 South. 1011; Elliot v. Gamble, 77 Fla. 798, 82 South. 253; Kerfoot v. Steele, 113 Ill. 610; Burnett v. Potts, 143 Ill. App. 160; Ormsby v. Graham, 123 Iowa, 202, 98 N. W. 724.

[3] Plaintiff's right of recovery depends upon whether his agreement with the Sequerias bound them to purchase the land under the terms of the listing contract. The rights of a mortgagor and those of a vendee under a contract of purchase are essentially different. If a mortgagor fails in his payments and the mortgage is foreclosed, he is allowed the statutory period for redemption. No such statutory right is given a vendee under an executory contract of sale. Such contracts frequently provide for the forfeiture of the vendee's rights thereunder on his failure to make payment at the precise time specified. The terms of the contract between defendant and Freitas brothers are not shown by the evidence. If plaintiff relies on their being the same as those of a mortgage, it devolved upon him to establish that fact. It is very clear that the Sequerias were not bound to purchase the property on the terms provided by the listing contract.

[4] In two letters written by defendant prior to his return to this country he made statements which might be construed as admissions of plaintiff's right to the alleged commissions. These letters were written after plaintiff had informed defendant that the property had been sold in accordance with the terms of the listing contract, and that the purchasers would assume payment of defendant's indebtedness to Freitas brothers. An admission based on incorrect information given by the plaintiff is of no weight in his favor. The defendant was not informed of the terms of plaintiff's agreement with the Sequerias during the life of the listing contract, and therefore it cannot be held that he assented thereto or waived any objections he may have had to the same. Gomez saw the agreement, but it was not shown that he was authorized to sell the property or to change the terms of plaintiff's contract with defendant. It only appears, and that merely by reason of a defective denial in the answer, that Gomez was authorized to convey land and receive payment therefor. Plaintiff himself was given "the sole and exclusive agency" for the sale of the land. In attempting to exercise the authority conferred upon him he made such a mistake that neither the defendant nor the purchasers were bound by the agreement which he executed. After the discovery of such mistake there remained three months during which he might himself have corrected the mistake if, as he alleges, the Sequerias were willing. His failure to earn the alleged commission, if it be finally decided that he has so failed, is due to his own neglect.

[5] Respondent contends that, by refusing to convey the property on the sole ground that his wife would not sign the quitclaim deed sent to him for execution, the defendant waived all other objections that he had an opportunity to make at that time. The simple answer is that defendant did not then have the opportunity to make the objections here relied on, because of plaintiff's incorrect statement that the land had been sold in accordance with the terms of the listing contract. Had that statement been true, the defendant could have made no objection which would have been a defense to this action.

Some of the denials in the answer are so defective in form as to constitute admissions. The foregoing discussion is based upon the effective denials of defendant. The defendant did not take the witness stand or offer any evidence, but submitted the case on the evidence produced by plaintiff. It has been assumed, therefore, that all of plaintiff's witnesses are entitled to the fullest credit.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [6] In respondent's petition for a rehearing it is urged that "the word 'incumbrance' used in the listing contract * * * was understood by Gulart to mean a mortgage," and that plaintiff was led so to believe by defendant's statements made at the time such contract was executed. It is argued that because the defendant had so misled the plaintiff the latter became entitled to a commission when the Sequerias agreed to purchase the property subject to such mortgage. Counsel, however, overlook the fact that the plaintiff alleged and the court found, on sufficient evidence introduced by plaintiff, that at the time the listing contract was executed—

> "the legal title to said premises was * * * vested in F. T. Freitas and V. T. Freitas, subject to an agreement of purchase and sale whereby said F. T. Freitas and V. T. Freitas agreed to sell said premises to defendant, * * * and that at all times said defendant owed the sum of $17,000 or thereabouts on the purchase price of said premises under said contract, * * * and that at the time of execution of said listing it was the understanding of plaintiff and defendant, * * * that in case said purchase price of $30,000 was not paid in cash, the purchaser, as part of said purchase price, should assume said incumbrance owing by defendant on said land to said F. T. Freitas and V. T. Freitas and pay same when due."

It is contended that the statement in the opinion to the effect that Gulart was employed to make a sale, rather than merely to procure a purchaser to whom the defendant might sell, is in conflict with the rule announced in Merriam v. Wickersham, 141 Cal. 567, 570, 75 Pac. 180. An examination of the transcript in that case discloses that the listing contract there under consideration was unlike the one in this case. By it the owner authorized the agent "exclusively to sell," and "to receive a deposit," and the owner agreed to convey the property "to any purchaser found by" the agent and to pay the agreed commission "if a purchaser is found by or through" the agent. There is no inconsistency between the decision in Merriam v. Wickersham and the opinion herein or the cases cited therein.

[7] It is insisted that the allegation in the complaint, admitted by a defective denial in the answer, to the effect that Gomez was given a "general power of attorney" by defendant, was sufficient to show that Gomez "had power to act for Azevedo in all things just as Azevedo could have done if personally present, and any act, word, or omission of Gomez which would have rendered him liable if he had been the owner will render Azevedo liable." Plaintiff's allegation, however, goes further than stated. It is alleged that—

"Defendant executed and delivered to one F. P. Gomez, Jr., his certain general power of attorney, in writing, duly executed and acknowledged, in which said power of attorney he appointed said F. P. Gomez, Jr., his attorney in fact with full power and authority to convey real property and interests therein, and to execute all necessary and proper transfers and conveyances thereof and to accept and receive payment therefor, and, generally, to do all acts necessary or proper for the transfer of any real property or interests therein owned by defendant."

"Where the authority to perform specific acts is given in the power, and general words are also employed, such words are limited to the particular acts authorized." Billings v. Morrow, 7 Cal. 172, 175 (68 Am. Dec. 235); Moore v. Gould, 151 Cal. 723, 728, 91 Pac. 616.

Authority "to do all acts necessary or proper for the transfer of any real property or interests therein owned by defendant" does not include the power to sell land or to agree upon the terms of sale thereof or to modify terms theretofore fixed by the owner, especially where another person has been given exclusive power to execute a contract of sale upon specified terms. The complaint alleges that the power of attorney was executed after the making of the listing contract and before the departure of defendant from California. From the whole of the surrounding circumstances it is apparent that the power of attorney was executed to enable Gomez to make the formal transfer of the property during the absence of defendant and not to give the former any discretion in fixing terms of sale. Gomez had no duty to perform until plaintiff made a sale in accordance with the terms of the listing contract, and no such sale was made, nor was Gomez ever informed that the Sequerias were willing to purchase the land on any other terms than those stated in their agreement with plaintiff, nor did they express such willingness to any person during the life of the listing contract.

[8] It is contended that the answer admits that the Sequerias were "ready, able and willing to assume the Freitas contract." In paragraph IX defendant positively "denies that Mike Sequeria and George Sequeria agreed or offered to purchase the premises as alleged in the complaint," and in paragraph XII he "alleges that the plaintiff did not at any time procure for the defendant purchaser for the real estate described in the said listing contract ready and willing and able or ready or willing or able to purchase the real estate therein described upon the terms therein described." No objection was made to the sufficiency of such denial and allegation, and the case was tried upon the theory that they were sufficient.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

RING et al. v. UNITED STATES GYPSUM CO. (Civ. 4488.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 3, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 2, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Findings on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Where the record presents a wide conflict in the testimony, findings based thereon, if supported by any evidence, are not disturbed.

2. Mines and minerals 🔑38(14)—Burden of proving abandonment of mining claim is on party asserting it.

In an action under Code Civ. Proc. § 738, to determine conflicting claims after defendant proves his right to possession, the burden is on plaintiff to show defendant's right had been abandoned or forfeited.

3. Mines and minerals 🔑38(21)—Evidence held to negative abandonment of claims.

Evidence held to negative abandonment by failure to sufficiently mine claims.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by A. P. Ring and others against the United States Gypsum Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

F. R. McNamee, of Los Angeles, and Charles L. Allison, of San Bernardino, for appellants.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles (Lawrence L. Otis, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an action under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure to determine conflicting claims to 10 placer mining locations near Amboy, San Bernardino county. The claims to which plaintiffs assert title are described as craters Nos. 1 to 10, inclusive, and the claims to which the defendant asserts title, and which covered substantially the same ground, were also ten in number and separately named. It was agreed that all locations were in proper form, and that in each case discovery of gypsum was made. The complaint and answer are in the usual form for actions of this nature, and no question arises upon the pleadings. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant, from which plaintiffs appeal upon a bill of exceptions. The only attack upon the judgment is that the findings of fact of the trial court were not supported by the evidence.

Briefly, the facts are that a portion of the ground covered by the land in dispute was originally located by Marcus Pluth and others, and that in 1905 he sold his interest therein to defendant's predecessor; that the defendant and his predecessors in interest have occupied the land continuously since 1905, together with some 10 or 12 other adjoining claims, all of which were worked under a general system of group development requiring a large annual expenditure of money, aggregating in the year 1919 the sum of over $18,000 and in the year 1920 the sum of over $141,000. On September 17, 1920, the plaintiffs, acting through the same Marcus Pluth, went upon the land in dispute and posted notices of location for their 10 separate claims. They then commenced this action to quiet title to the property upon the theory that it had been abandoned by the defendant.

The trial was had without a jury, and at its conclusion the trial court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law, wherein it was found:

> "That all and every of defendant's claims comprise the group of said Amboy mining claims, and that all of said group of mining claims, and each of them, were worked, operated, developed and improved in common as an entire group of claims for more than five (5) years prior to the commencement of this action, and that especially and particularly during the years 1919 and 1920 they were so worked, operated, developed and improved as a group of mining claims, and that sums of money amounting in the aggregate to $18,989.76 during the year 1919, and $141,825.29 during the year 1920, were expended for work, labor, and improvements thereon tending directly to the development and benefit of each and all of said claims and to facilitate the extraction of mineral therefrom."

[1-3] The main ground of appeal is that this finding of fact is not supported by the evidence. At the outset it should not be necessary to do more than call attention to the fact that the record presents such a wide conflict in the testimony offered that, if any evidence appears therein which supports the finding of the trial court, that finding should not be disturbed on this appeal. It is the theory of respondent's case that from the period of 1905 until 1920 it had continuously worked these properties under a general system of group development, and that, although during the years 1919 and 1920 work may not have been done on each of the separate ten claims involved in the litigation, sufficient work was done under the system of general development to avoid a forfeiture of the claims under the law. The respondent having shown that it had the right to possession of the property through valid locations, the burden of proof was upon the appellant to show that the respondent's right had been abandoned or forfeited. The respondent offered in evidence its proof of labor duly sworn to and filed as required by law, wherein it was shown that a sum of money sufficient to meet the legal requirements had been expended upon the claims in dispute. In addition to this the testimony of its general superintendent was in part as follows:

> "Q. How much work was done on the western part of the group as and for assessment work, if you know, in 1919? A. Well, I could not say just how much was done in 1919. Q. You mean you cannot segregate it? A. No, I could not say; I don't know. I know that every year we were in operation we worked the south deposit somewhere. A great many times we hauled up with teams and so forth, a great amount of material to run through as a test. In the first place we ran into difficulties of salt in the south deposit in originally starting out, and we hadn't any way to overcome it at the time, which was the cause of our moving our tracks from there to the east deposit. We afterwards put in another system in the mill by which we could clean this gypsum, and we hauled up many tons and run through as tests to see if the system would clean that south deposit. Q. Was that done at various times? A. Done very near every year that I have any recollection. Q. Were you finally able to eliminate the salt? A. To a very large degree; that is less than one-half of 1 per cent. Q. That makes the produce merchantable, usable? A. Yes, sir. Q. Were there any intentions at any time to abandon those claims on the west? A. Never. The real intention was probably to go back to those claims, because the gypsum was cleaner and in greater bodies than these they have got now. Q. Well, in the general working as a group, you included all the claims? A. Yes, sir."

In explanation of this testimony it should be added that the 10 claims in dispute lay directly south of the mill which respondent operated on the "Holdtite" claim, and that they lay partly west and partly south of the second mill which the respondent operated upon the "Enterprise No. 3" claim; that during the latter part of the period in question the greater amount of gypsum was taken from the "Enterprise No. 3," and that when the witness mentioned the south deposit he referred to the deposit upon the claims here in dispute. It was also shown that the deposit of gypsum lay directly beneath the surface, which was a thin coating of mud and silt, the entire territory being the bed of an old lake which had completely dried and disappeared. The method of operations was to plow or scrape the surface from the mineral deposit, and then to load the mineral into trucks by means of scrapers attached to tractors. The mineral deposit was then hauled to the mill, where it was cleaned and dried. It is claimed, with apparent good reason, by the respondent, that this process of cleaning the dirt from the mineral deposit at the mill was a substantial and important part of extracting the mineral from the ground. That is to say, that the gypsum lying in a solid mass did not require any mining operations such as are necessary in the ordinary quartz or placer mining for gold or silver or other similar minerals, but that all that was required was to carefully clean from the mineral deposit the surface layer of dirt. In accordance with this theory it was then shown that numerous roads had been constructed leading from the various claims to the mill operated by the respondent, some of which were made specially for the accommodation of tractors, and that this work was a necessary part of the development of the various claims for the purpose of facilitating the extraction of the mineral therefrom.

Upon this evidence, as we have said, the trial court found that labor expended by the respondent tended directly to the development and benefit of each and all of said claims, and to facilitate the extraction of mineral therefrom. This finding was plainly on a question of fact, which the trial court was required in the first instance to determine. Big Three Mining & Milling Co. v. Hamilton, 157 Cal. 130, 135, 107 Pac. 301, 137 Am. St. Rep. 118; Yreka Mining & Milling Co. v. Knight, 133 Cal. 544, 549, 65 Pac. 1091.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BROWN. (Cr. 941, 2583.)

1. Criminal law 🔑406(7)—Homicide 🔑156 (2)—Subsequent declaration of accused held admissible to show express malice.

In a prosecution for homicide, evidence that shortly after the shooting defendant exclaimed he "got one of them and would get the rest," though inadmissible as part of the res gestæ, was competent as an admission of defendant tending to show ill will and relevant to the issue of express malice.

2. Homicide 🔑203(3)—Evidence held to show declaration was made under sense of impending death.

Evidence that the alleged dying declaration was made shortly before the death of deceased, while he had extreme difficulty in getting breath to speak, and after he had given his property to his sister to whom he made the declaration, and had stated he knew he was dying, was sufficient to show the declaration was made under a sense of impending death.

3. Homicide 🔑325—Objection part of dying declaration was conclusion must be especially pointed out by objection or motion to exclude.

The admission in evidence of a dying declaration does not require reversal, though a part of the declaration consisted of a conclusion and not the narration of a fact, where no objection to the declaration on that ground was made below, nor was any motion made to strike any of its objectionable features.

4. Homicide 🔑200—Dying declaration is admissible to negative self-defense.

The fact that defendant admitted killing deceased does not render a dying declaration inadmissible, where it tended to negative defendant's claim of self-defense.

5. Homicide 🔑117—Firing shot which hastened death after apparent necessity had passed is homicide.

Where defendant fired four shots, all of which struck deceased, he was guilty of homicide in firing the last shots after any apparent necessity for self-defense had passed if those shots hastened to a material degree the death of decedent, even though the first shots were fired in self-defense and would probably have resulted in death.

6. Homicide 🔑291—Instruction held to require finding shots fired after apparent necessity had passed were cause of death.

An instruction authorizing a conviction, notwithstanding the plea of self-defense, if the jury found that the shot or shots which killed deceased were fired after all apparent danger had passed, required the jury to find that the shots fired after the danger had passed were the cause of death and not the former shots fired in self-defense.

7. Criminal law 🔑830—Requested instruction properly refused if any part should not have been given.

If any part of a single requested instruction should not have been given, the action of the trial court in rejecting the whole will be affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court Denying Hearing.

8. Criminal law 🔑758—Requested instruction as to weight of defendant's testimony held erroneous.

A statement in a requested instruction that when a defendant takes the stand his testimony is not to be distrusted merely because he is the defendant, but is to be weighed in the same light as the testimony of any other witness in the case, was erroneous as an instruction as to the credibility of a witness, contrary to Const. art. 6, § 19, prohibiting judges to charge the jurors with respect to matters of fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Robert Brown was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

S. S. Hahn, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendant was charged with the murder of one William Antior. The jury returned a verdict of guilty of murder in the second degree, and defendant now appeals from the judgment and from the order denying him a new trial. No question is raised as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. Appellant, who admitted the killing but claimed that he acted in self-defense, complains of certain rulings and instructions.

Defendant occupied an apartment on the third floor of an apartment house in the city of Los Angeles. On the second floor lived a couple who on the evening of May 20, 1922, were entertaining in their apartment the deceased and a few other guests. These latter seem to have been an uproarious party of merrymakers, for some time after midnight defendant went to their door and complained of the noise they were making, threatening to have them arrested for disturbing his peace. The hostess requested defendant to go away, and threatened, in turn, to have him arrested for disturbing the peace of herself and guests. Thereupon defendant returned to his apartment on the floor above. Shortly thereafter the deceased, who was unarmed, left the apartment where he and others were guests of the couple on the second floor, and walking upstairs to defendant's apartment, invited the latter to come out and fight. Defendant, who was armed with a pistol, fired four shots at the deceased. Each of the four bullets took effect, and Antior died in a hospital 14 hours later. According to the evidence adduced by the prosecution, defendant, while seated on a table in his apartment, fired the shots at the deceased while the latter stood in the hallway about two feet outside and in front of the open door leading into defendant's room. Witnesses for the defendant, on the other hand, testified that when the deceased arrived at the spot in front of the door leading to defendant's apartment the door was closed, and that, after challenging defendant to come out and fight, Antior angrily pushed the door open and entered the room, exclaiming as he did so, "Well, if you don't go out and fight, I will go and get you, you son of a bitch," and that it was then that defendant fired the four shots.

[1] A witness for the prosecution, over defendant's objection that it was not a part of the res gestæ, testified that shortly after the shooting defendant exclaimed, "I got one of them, and I will get the rest." This testimony was properly admitted. People v. Sampo, 17 Cal. App. 135, 149, 118 Pac. 957; People v. Hawes, 98 Cal. 648, 33 Pac. 791. While it was not admissible as a part of the res gestæ, yet as an admission of defendant tending to show ill will toward the decedent immediately after the fatal shots were fired it was relevant to the issue of express malice. State v. Smith, 125 Mo. 2, 28 S. W. 181; Lewis v. State, 29 Tex. App. 201, 15 S. W. 642, 25 Am. St. Rep. 720.

[2] A dying declaration given by the deceased to his sister was admitted in evidence. It is contended that the preliminary proof upon behalf of the people was not sufficient to lay a proper foundation for its admission. The sister was with her dying brother at the hospital for about two hours immediately before he expired. It was during this time and shortly before he breathed his last that he made his dying declaration. A witness who was present when the declaration was made testified that shortly prior thereto the deceased took a ring off his finger, gave it to his sister, and told her to keep it; that he informed his sister that his furniture was paid for, and told her to keep that also; that he told her to keep the sewing machine, upon which he said there remained one or more payments to be made; that he told her to keep everything; that in giving his dying declaration he gave it "between breaths"; and that it "would take him five minutes to get his breath after saying a few words." The sister testified that she asked her brother if he could talk and that he replied that "he knew he was dying." Thereupon he made his dying declaration. Taking all the evidence together and considering all the attending circumstances, it was sufficiently shown that the deceased made the declaration under the sense of impending death, and that there was nothing to show a revived or subsequent hope of recovery. The court did not err in admitting it in evidence.

The declaration was not reduced to writing—the deceased expired before that could be done. The sister testified that it was given in the following words:

> "I asked my brother, I says: 'Billie, tell me the truth. Where were you when you were shot?' He said, 'I was outside of Brown's door with my back to his door.' I said, 'Did you go in Brown's room?' and he said, 'No, he killed me in cold blood.' So I said: 'Now, Billie, tell me the truth. I will ask you again whether you were in Brown's room.' He said, 'No,' which he says, 'I asked Brown to come outside'; and he says, 'After I come in off that little porch my back was to Brown's door, and Brown sat on his table in his bathrobe and shot me from the back.' I said, 'You wasn't in his room?' and he said, 'No.' He said, 'I will make that statement to the detectives if you get them.' And I telephoned twice for the detectives, and they were so long coming that he died about 10 minutes before they got there."

[3, 4] Appellant urges as further objections to the admission of this declaration that parts of it were but conclusions of the deceased, such, for instance, as the statement that "he killed me in cold blood," and that there was no necessity for its introduction, because the killing was admitted. There is no merit in either contention. True, the declaration that the decedent was killed "in cold blood" was not the narration of a fact but was an expression of the mere opinion or belief of the dying man. However, the declaration was not objected to in the court below upon the ground that any part of it consisted of conclusions or of statements of mere opinion, nor was any motion made to strike out any of its objectionable features. The attention of the lower court not having been called to this possible ground for a motion to strike, appellant cannot now be heard to urge the objection for the first time in this court. There is no merit in the point that because the killing was admitted there was no necessity for introducing the dying declaration. The declaration tended to destroy defendant's claim that he shot in self-defense.

As already stated, each of the four shots took effect in the decedent's body. The trial court, after instructing the jury clearly and fully as to the law of self-defense applicable to the circumstances of the case, told them that if, under all the circumstances as they would appear to a reasonable man situated as defendant was, the firing of one shot or more was all the force appearing necessary to the defendant as a reasonable man to resist the assault upon him, then under such circumstances the firing of any additional shot or shots would not be justifiable by the law of self-defense. The instruction as a whole was substantially the same as that which was commented upon and upheld in People v. Barrett, 22 Cal. App. 780, 786, 136 Pac. 520. It had reference solely to the apparent necessity, or absence thereof, for firing fatal shots in excess of those sufficient to protect the defendant.

[5, 6] As a basis for his argument against the instruction appellant claims that it was the first or second shot which caused the death of Antior, and that therefore he was not amenable to a conviction of homicide by reason of any bullet which was fired into the body of the deceased after the latter had received his mortal wound; that the firing of such subsequent shot or shots might constitute good ground for his conviction of assault—a crime with which he was not charged and for which he was not on trial—but that since it could not afford ground for his conviction of the only crime for which he was on trial, homicide, it was error to give the instruction. There is no merit in the point. All of the wounds were of such a character that the jury would be warranted in finding that any one of the bullets, if not sufficient in itself to produce death, at least contributed to and hastened the demise of Antior. If appellant did not fire the last shot in self-defense, and if the wound inflicted by it contributed to or hastened Antior's death, the jury could properly find appellant guilty of homicide by reason of that shot, even though the first was fired in self-defense and though at the time the last shot was fired the deceased was already so severely wounded that his death would have followed in a very short time. Rogers v. State, 60 Ark. 76, 29 S. W. 894, 31 L. R. A. 465, 46 Am. St. Rep. 154. It is said by Mr. Bishop that—

> "Whenever a blow is inflicted under circumstances that render the party inflicting it clearly responsible, if death follows, he will be deemed guilty of homicide, though the person beaten would have died from other causes, or would not have died from this one had not others operated with it; provided the blow really contributed either mediately or immediately to the death in a degree sufficient for the law's notice." 2 Bish. Cr. Law (New) par. 637.

Moreover, the instruction made it clear to the jurors that they could not convict appellant of homicide by reason of any shot fired after apparent danger had passed unless they found that such subsequent shot killed the deceased. As a part of the instruction complained of the court specifically charged the jury that if they found "that the shot or shots which killed deceased * * * were fired by defendant * * * after all apparent danger which would justify a reasonable man in further resistance had passed, then and in that event the defendant would not be justified under the law of self-defense." (Italics ours.)

Finally, it is urged that the court erred in refusing to give an instruction requested by appellant. It seems that a witness for the prosecution testified that some time previous to the trial defendant had threatened that if he (the witness) should testify against defendant on the trial, "he [the witness] would eat dust." Defendant voluntarily took the stand in his own behalf and denied that he had made any such threat. This was as far as his testimony went. He did not testify to any fact which constituted a constituent element of the charge in issue—the killing of Antior.

The requested instruction was as follows:

> "You are instructed that the defendant in a criminal action need not take the witness stand to testify in his own behalf, and his failure to take the stand should not influence you against him. When a defendant does take the stand he has a right to testify about any portion of his case, and no prejudice should be raised in the jurors' minds against him because he does not testify about all instances concerning his case. When a defendant takes the stand his testimony is not to be distrusted merely because he is the defendant; on the contrary, his testimony is to be weighed by you in the same light as the testimony of any other witness in the case." (Italics ours.)

The instruction was properly refused. It may be that under the circumstances it would have been error had the court refused a requested instruction to the effect that where a defendant in a criminal action testifies only to a collateral matter—a matter not directly related to any fact which is a constituent part of the crime with which he is charged—no inference unfavorable to him can be drawn from his failure to testify to such matters as are directly connected with the charge in issue. But that was not the instruction requested. If the court had given the instruction as requested, its effect would have been to charge the jury that when a defendant takes the stand and testifies concerning "any portion of his case" (such is the language of the requested instruction), no prejudice should be raised against him because he does not testify to all the facts of his case. Such an instruction is too broad. It is not a correct statement of the law. Had it been given, it would have been tantamount to a charge that the defendant in a criminal action can tell half of the story touching the merits of the case and then stop short by omitting to explain incriminating circumstances and events in which he participated and concerning which he is fully informed, without subjecting his silence to the inferences to be naturally drawn from it. Such is not the law. A prisoner who takes the stand in his own behalf waives his constitutional privilege of silence; and if he testifies to the merits of the charge but withholds testimony of other facts which form a part of the charge against him and of which he is informed, he must expect to incur the discredit which the jury would naturally visit upon the ordinary witness pursuing a like course. State v. Harrington, 12 Nev. 125; State v. Ulsemer, 24 Wash. 657, 64 Pac. 800; State v. Tatman, 59 Iowa, 471, 13 N. W. 632; Diggs v. United States, 220 Fed. 545, 136 C. C. A. 147, where an elaborate discussion of the authorities may be found; affirmed 242 U. S. 470, 493, 494, 37 Sup. Ct. 192, 61 L. Ed. 442, L. R. A. 1917F, 502, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 1168.

[7] Moreover, the concluding part of the requested instruction, that which says that the testimony of the defendant in a criminal action "is to be weighed by you in the same light as the testimony of any other witness in the case," justified the refusal of the whole instruction. "* * * Any instruction at all as to the credibility of any witness, or the weight to be given to his testimony, is violative of section 19 of article 6 of the Constitution, which provides that 'judges shall not charge jurors with respect to matters of fact.'" People v. Van Ewan, 111 Cal. 149, 43 Pac. 521. Such instructions should not be given, and it is always proper to refuse them. People v. Winters, 125 Cal. 329–330, 57 Pac. 1067; People v. Ross, 134 Cal. 258, 66 Pac. 229. See People v. Hiltel, 131 Cal. 580, 63 Pac. 919. It has been repeatedly held that if any part of a single instruction should not have been given the action of the trial court in rejecting the whole will be affirmed. People v. Davis, 64 Cal. 440, 1 Pac. 889.

We concur: WORKS, J.; CRAIG, J.

Opinion of the Supreme Court in Banc Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [8] In denying the petition for rehearing, although this point is not urged in the petition, we do not wish to be understood as approving that portion of the opinion dealing with the last instruction set forth in the opinion with reference to the defendant's testimony. It is unnecessary to determine in this case whether the defendant was entitled to an instruction that—

> "When a defendant does take the stand he has a right to testify about any portion of his case, and no prejudice should be raised in the jurors' minds against him because he does not testify about all instances concerning his case."

The instruction was properly refused because it infringes upon the province of the jury in the last clause reading as follows:

> "When a defendant takes the stand his testimony is not to be distrusted merely because he is the defendant, on the contrary, his testimony is to be weighed by you in the same light as the testimony of any other witness in the case." People v. Winters, 125 Cal. 325, 330, 57 Pac. 1067, and other cases cited in the concluding paragraph of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal.

2. Criminal law 🔑90(2)—Justice's court in city held to have jurisdiction of prosecution for violation of ordinance prohibiting sale of liquor.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 103, and Pen. Code, § 1425, justice's court of city of Berkeley had jurisdiction of prosecution for violation of city ordinance prohibiting sale of liquor and making violations a misdemeanor.

3. Habeas corpus 🔑30(2)—Complaint for selling, though not alleging sale for beverage purposes, held not open to attack.

Complaint in justice's court of Berkeley alleging adoption of ordinance prohibiting sale of intoxicating liquor, but permitting sale for non-beverage purposes, and charging that defendant willfully and in violation thereof sold intoxicating liquor, thereby violating the ordinance and becoming liable to the penalty provided therein, did not wholly fail to state public offense so as to be open to attack by habeas corpus, though not alleging sale was for beverage purposes.

4. Habeas corpus ⚷85(1)—Presumed that arresting officers and magistrate performed their duties.

It is presumed on habeas corpus that police, who arrested petitioner, and magistrate before whom she appeared and was convicted and sentenced, performed their duties properly and with due regard to the law and petitioner's rights.

Original application by Katharyn Hayward for writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Harry G. McKannay, of San Francisco, and Allen C. Cunha, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Ezra W. Decoto, Dist. Atty., and Frank M. Shay, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Oakland, for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. Petitioner, Katharyn Hayward, was convicted in the justice's court of the city of Berkeley upon a complaint alleging in part and charging as follows:

> "That heretofore, to wit, on the 14th day of June, 1921, the city council of the city of Berkeley, in pursuance of the power and authority in it vested by the Constitution of the State of California, and in it vested by law, duly passed and adopted a certain ordinance, entitled 'Ordinance No. 724 N. S., prohibiting the sale, manufacture, unlawful possession or transportation of intoxicating liquors, and providing penalties for violation hereof.'
> "That said Ordinance No. 724 N. S. now is in full force and effect in the city of Berkeley. That Section 18 of said Ordinance No. 724 N. S. declares any violation of said Ordinance No. 724 N. S. to be a misdemeanor.
> "That heretofore, to wit, on the 3d day of October, 1922, in the city of Berkeley, in the county of Alameda, state of California, a certain person, to wit, Katharyn Hayward, did then and there commit the crime of misdemeanor, to wit, the said Katharyn Hayward did then and there willfully, and in violation of said Ordinance No. 724 N. S., and more particularly section 2 thereof, sell intoxicating liquor within the city of Berkeley, thereby violating the provisions thereof, and thereby becoming liable to the penalty provided therein."

Petitioner pleaded guilty and was sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail of the county of Alameda for a period of six months. Thereafter she took an appeal from the judgment of conviction to the superior court of the county. The superior court affirmed the judgment of the justice's court and she was remanded to the custody of the sheriff. Subsequently she applied to this court for a writ of habeas corpus and was released upon bail pending a hearing of this proceeding.

Petitioner's sole contention is that the complaint upon which she was convicted "utterly and wholly fails to state a public offense known to the law," for the reason that it fails to allege that the intoxicating liquor was sold for beverage purposes. Section 2 of the ordinance particularly referred to in the complaint, and for violating the provisions of which petitioner was arrested, reads as follows:

> "Sec. 2. No person shall manufacture, sell, barter, transport, import, export, deliver, furnish or possess any intoxicating liquor, except as authorized in this ordinance, and all the provisions of this ordinance shall be liberally construed to the end that the use of intoxicating liquor as a beverage may be prevented. Liquor for nonbeverage purposes and wine for sacramental purposes may be manufactured, purchased, sold, bartered, transported, imported, exported, delivered, furnished and possessed, but only by a person holding a valid permit from the United States Internal Revenue Department, and only in accordance with the laws of the United States; provided, nothing in this ordinance shall prevent the purchase and sale of warehouse receipts covering distilled spirits on deposit in government bonded warehouses, and no special tax liability shall attach to the business of purchasing and selling such warehouse receipts."

Counsel for petitioner concede that a writ of habeas corpus may not subserve the office of a demurrer (In re Ruef, 150 Cal. 665, 89 Pac. 605), but argue that this rule does not apply to courts of inferior and limited jurisdiction, citing Ex parte Kearny, 55 Cal. 212, and Ex parte Greenall, 153 Cal. 767, 96 Pac. 804. Since the opinion in Ex parte Greenall, supra, was written, in 1908, there has been exhaustive discussion of the rule mentioned. Mr. Justice Hart, in Re Avdalas, 10 Cal. App. 507, 512, 102 Pac. 674, 676, says:

> "It does not definitely appear from the opinion in the Greenall Case, supra, that the court intends to hold that the writ of habeas corpus, as to misdemeanors of which justices' and police courts have jurisdiction, shall serve the purpose of a writ or proceeding for the correction of errors, and, therefore, I agree with the court in the case of Ex parte Williams, 121 Cal. 328, 53 Pac. 706, that the writ is not to be made to serve the office of a demurrer."

Petitioner in Re Turck, 37 Cal. App. 601, 604, 174 Pac. 100, relied upon Ex parte Kearny, supra, and Ex parte Greenall, supra. Mr. Justice Conrey, in the opinion of the court, says:

> "* * * Ex parte Kearny, 55 Cal. 212. The particular application of the rule in that case was that the court determined that the alleged offense stated in the complaint in the police court where the petitioner was convicted did not constitute any crime against the law, and that therefore the petitioner was entitled to be discharged on habeas corpus. In Ex parte Greenall, 153 Cal. 767, 770 (96 Pac. 804, 806), the court said: 'It has been the uniform practice to consider on habeas corpus the question of the sufficiency of the complaint in such inferior courts, and to discharge the prisoner where such complaint failed to show a public offense under the laws of the state.'

"The courts have been careful, however, not to extend the principles above stated so far as to interfere with the use of the right of appeal as the ordinary remedy of a defendant in a criminal case. 'The writ of habeas corpus is not intended to review the regularity of the proceedings in any case, but rather to restore to his liberty the citizen who is imprisoned without color of law.' In re Kowalsky, 73 Cal. 120, 122, 14 Pac. 399. 'A writ of of habeas corpus cannot be made the vehicle of determining mere errors, where a conviction has been had and the commitment thereon is in due form. If the court below had no jurisdiction of the offense charged, or if it affirmatively appears by the record that the prisoner was tried and sentenced for the commission of an act which, under the law, constitutes no crime, the judgment is void and the prisoner should be discharged.' Ex parte Miranda, 73 Cal. 365, 371, 14 Pac. 888, 891. In Ex parte Turner, 75 Cal. 226, 16 Pac. 898, it appeared that in a police court the petitioner had been convicted of a misdemeanor. The judgment did not recite the date of the offense or state the elements of the crime as fully as they were necessarily stated in the complaint. Nevertheless the petitioner was remanded, the court saying: 'The distinction between a void and a voidable judgment is sometimes very nice, and the judgment will fall under the one class or the other accordingly as it is regarded for different purposes. * * * After trial and conviction the commitment is of a higher dignity than an ordinary commitment holding to answer. This is true with courts, both of special or limited jurisdiction and those of general jurisdiction. The judgment of a court of inferior jurisdiction is, to a great extent, as far beyond the reach of collateral attack by the writ of habeas corpus as the judgments of higher courts are. Church on Habeas Corpus, § 240. * * * The failure of the court to state the elements of the crime in the judgment as fully as they were necessarily stated in the complaint does not render the judgment void. The offense is sufficiently designated in the judgment. To entitle the petitioner to a discharge, we must necessarily assume that the record of conviction fails to show the commission of any offense. To reach this conclusion, we should have to resort to a hypercritical, overnice, and technical examination of the commitment, convert the writ of habeas corpus into a writ of error, and defeat the ends of justice.'"

In Re Reineger, 184 Cal. 97, 193 Pac. 81, also habeas corpus proceeding, the Supreme Court said, at page 104 of 184 Cal., at page 84 of 193 Pac.:

"It may be that the complaint is uncertain because it does not state whether the petitioner is a wholesale dealer or a retail dealer as defined in the act. It does not allege whether the 60 cans sold amounted to one full case or not. Habeas corpus lies in such cases only when the magistrate is without jurisdiction to issue the warrant of arrest. Where a complaint in a court of inferior jurisdiction states facts showing that the defendant has committed a public offense, but is subject to attack by demurrer on the ground that it is uncertain as to the particular offense committed, the inferior court has jurisdiction and the defect will not be ground for his release on habeas corpus. Ex parte McNulty, 77 Cal. 164, 166, 11 Am. St. Rep. 257, 19 Pac. 237. There is nothing in Ex parte Kearney, 55 Cal. 212, or Ex parte Greenall, 156 Cal. 767, 96 Pac. 804, that is contrary to this rule. The complaints there considered failed to show that the defendant had committed any offense whatever."

This opinion was written by Mr. Justice Shaw, and concurred in by the then chief justice (Angellotti), who wrote the opinion in Ex parte Greenall.

In Re Culver, 187 Cal. 437, 202 Pac. 661, Mr. Justice Lennon, writing the opinion for the court, says:

"It is true, as petitioner contends, that it is a settled rule in habeas corpus proceedings that a court may determine whether or not a complaint in a justice's court in a criminal proceeding states facts sufficient to constitute a public offense. Ex parte Kearney, 55 Cal. 212; Ex parte Greenall, 153 Cal. 767, 770, 96 Pac. 804; Matter of Ah Sing, 156 Cal. 349, 104 Pac. 448. However, the rule is also well established that in determining the sufficiency of such a complaint the greatest liberality of construction must be indulged; if the complaint states facts which constitute a crime, it will not be held insufficient because other facts are stated which are irrelevant or immaterial or because the law violated by the alleged acts is inaccurately described therein. Ex parte Williams, 121 Cal. 328, 330, 53 Pac. 706."

In the Matter of Kaster, 52 Cal. App. 454, 198 Pac. 1029, it was said:

"The law is clear that when the complaint wholly fails to state a cause of action the writ of habeas corpus will lie (Ex parte Williams, 121 Cal. 328, 53 Pac. 706; Ex parte Kearny, 55 Cal. 228; Ex parte Sullivan, 17 Cal. App. 278, 119 Pac. 526. But '* * * the proceeding may not be made to subserve the office of a demurrer; and if the facts alleged squint at a substantive statement of the offense, no matter how defectively or inartificially they may be stated, or however confused and beclouded they may be rendered through intermingling them with immaterial or unnecessary averments, the writ will not lie. Ex parte Whitaker, 43 Ala. 323; Matter of Prime, 1 Barb, 340; Ex parte Williams, 121 Cal. 330, 331, 53 Pac. 706.' To same effect, Ex parte Ruef, 150 Cal. 665, 89 Pac. 605; In re Avdalas, 10 Cal. App. 507, 102 Pac. 674."

The Matter of Kaster was heard after decision in the District Court of Appeal by the Supreme Court (185 Cal. 647, 198 Pac. 1031), which said:

"The court [referring to the District Court of Appeal] filed a written opinion. * * * All points available to petitioner on habeas corpus are considered in that opinion, which, to our minds, correctly states the law in regard thereto. The application for a writ is denied. All concur."

The last expression of the Supreme Court upon the subject is to be found in Re Von Perhacs, 212 Pac. 689, decided March 1, 1923, in which the court said:

> "Habeas corpus may not be resorted to in lieu of a demurrer to a complaint in a misdemeanor case upon a ground of uncertainty, etc. The defect, if any, in the complaint in the instant case, for failure to specify the particulars of the offense charged, might have been remedied by demurrer, and if not by demurrer, then by motion in arrest of judgment as provided under section 1452, Penal Code."

Extended reference is made to the discussion of this subject by the appellate courts for the purpose of demonstrating that there is a marked trend in the decisions toward a more liberal application of the rule as stated in Ex parte Kearny, supra, and Ex parte Greenall, supra. Indeed, we feel constrained to say that the rule of those cases has been whittled down by judicial construction until it has become a mere shadow line of authority.

[1] The objection as to the uncertainty of the allegations in the complaint (section 952, Pen. Code) is answered by what was said by the Supreme Court in Re Von Perhacs, above quoted, and also, with more particularity, in Re Reineger, 184 Cal. 97, 193 Pac. 81; Re Avdalas, 10 Cal. App. 507, 102 Pac. 674; and in People v. Bonfanti, 40 Cal. App. 614, 181 Pac. 80.

[2] The justice's court of the city of Berkeley is established under the provisions of section 103 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This section provides that—

> "Justices of the peace of cities and justices' courts of cities shall also have jurisdiction of all proceedings for the violation of any ordinance of any city in which courts are established, both civil and criminal, * * * and generally exercise all powers, duties and jurisdiction civil and criminal, of police judges, judges of police courts, recorder's court or mayor's court, within such city."

The justice's court of the city of Berkeley has jurisdiction of certain public offenses committed in the county of Alameda, including "all misdemeanors punishable by fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment." Pen. Code, § 1425. It is plain that the offense charged against the defendant comes within these provisions.

Counsel for petitioner calls our attention to the fact that Ordinance No. 724 (New Series) of the city of Berkeley is identical with the Volstead Act, and cites the cases of United States v. Dowling (D. C.) 278 Fed. 630; United States v. Horton (D. C.) 282 Fed. 731, 732; State v. Catalino, 118 Wash. 611, 204 Pac. 179, 180; State v. Bulloch, 151 La. 593, 92 South. 127; and United States v. Boasberg (D. C.) 283 Fed. 305, as authority for the proposition that a complaint under such a law fails to state a public offense unless it charges that the intoxicating liquor was sold for "beverage purposes." An examination of these cases shows that in United States v. Dowling, supra, each defendant filed a demurrer and the demurrer was sustained, the court stating: "If [the indictment] is bad, the remedy is by demurrer or motion in arrest of judgment." In United States v. Horton, supra, the indictment, upon demurrer, was held fatally defective. In State v. Catalino, supra, the concluding paragraph of the court's opinion is:

> "The court should have granted the defendant's motion for arrest of judgment, and for that reason the judgment is reversed."

In State v. Bulloch, supra, the case was decided upon a motion in arrest of judgment. In United States v. Boasberg, supra, the matter was submitted and decided upon demurrers and motions to quash the indictments.

[3, 4] The charging part of the complaint is that—

> "Katharyn Hayward did then and there willfully, and in violation of said Ordinance No. 724 N. S., and more particularly section 2 thereof, sell intoxicating liquor within the city of Berkeley, thereby violating the provisions thereof and thereby becoming liable to the penalty provided therein."

The most that can be said in criticism of the allegation quoted is that it may not be sufficiently specific, and that it is the mere statement of a conclusion. But, surely, it attempts to charge an offense; it, at least, as was said in Ex parte Williams, 121 Cal. 328, 53 Pac. 706, supra, "squints" at an offense. It seems to us that it clearly charges that petitioner sold intoxicating liquor within the city of Berkeley in violation of law. Certainly there is nothing ambiguous about the language used. She was not misled in any way by the charge, and pleaded guilty thereto. The commitment shows that after conviction "defendant Katharyn Hayward being present in court, said defendant was informed by the court of the nature of the complaint filed against her, and of her plea, and of her conviction of said offense, and was asked by the court if she had any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against her; and no sufficient cause being alleged, or appearing to the court," etc. It is presumed that the police who arrested petitioner, and the magistrate before whom she appeared, was convicted, and sentenced, performed their duties properly and with due regard to the law and the rights of the petitioner. We have no hesitancy in saying, in conclusion, that, in our opinion, the complaint does not wholly fail to state a public offense, and that any defects therein might have been remedied by demurrer or by motion in arrest of judgment.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded.

GLENN v. INOUYE. (Civ. 4132.)

Landlord and tenant ⟹95—Lessor held entitled to cancel lease upon entering into a contract for "sale" of property.

Where a lease provided that notice of cancellation should only be given in the event that the lessor intended to erect a new building on the premises, "or shall have disposed of said premises by sale or ground lease," notice of cancellation was properly given where lessor had entered into a contract for the sale of the property, title to remain in him until full payment of the purchase price, the word "sale" including either a present sale or an agreement of sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Sale.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by H. R. Glenn against Takara Inouye to cancel a lease. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Collier & Labarere, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Marion Wright, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This action was brought by H. R. Glenn, respondent, against Takara Inouye, appellant, to recover the possession of certain premises situated in Los Angeles, Cal., and held by appellant under a certain lease from the Alco Realty Company, a corporation, to appellant.

The Alco Realty Company, a corporation, on or about March 21, 1921, leased to Takara Inouye, the appellant herein, by a certain lease in writing, the premises described as "the two upper floors at No. 128 E. First street, Los Angeles, California," for the period of two years and six months from April 1, 1921, at a monthly rental of $250, payable in advance on the first day of each month of said term.

The said lease was accepted by the appellant, who thereupon went into possession of the leased premises, under and by virtue of said lease, and still continues to hold and occupy the same. Appellant has paid the rental provided for in the lease and is not in default in the payment of rental. The said lease contains the following clause:

> "It is expressly stipulated and agreed by and between the parties hereto that one of the provisions for granting this lease is that the lessor may, at any time upon 60 days' written notice to the lessee of its intention so to do, cancel this lease: Provided, however, that the above notice of cancellation shall only be given in the event that the lessor, its successors or assigns, intend to erect a new building on the premises, or shall have disposed of said premises, or shall have disposed of said premises by sale or ground lease."

The Alco Realty Company, on or about February 25, 1922, entered into a contract in writing with H. R. Glenn, the respondent herein, whereby the Alco Realty Company, as seller, agreed to sell to H. R. Glenn, and the said H. R. Glenn, as buyer, agreed to buy, the property involved in this action for the sum of $55,000, payable $15,000 upon the execution of the contract, $5,000 on December 30, 1922, and the balance of $35,000 to be paid in installments of $500 per month with interest, title to remain in the seller until the full amount of the purchase price shall have been paid. The title to the said premises still remains in the Alco Realty Company, the full purchase price as yet not having been paid.

After the execution of said contract between the Alco Realty Company and respondent, the Alco Realty Company, on or about February 27, 1922, caused to be served on the appellant a 60-day notice of its intention to cancel appellant's lease, stating in said notice that "it was selling" the property to H. R. Glenn, the respondent. The appellant continues in possession of the demised premises, claiming the right of possession under his lease.

The court rendered judgment in favor of respondent, declaring the said lease to be terminated, and ordered restitution of the demised premises to the respondent. The sole point involved in this appeal is whether or not the contract of February 25, 1922, between the Alco Realty Company and the respondent, comes within the terms of the clause of the lease above set out, authorizing the lessor to terminate said lease upon 60-days' notice.

The appellant contends that only by a sale of said premises could the lessor acquire the right to cancel the lease by giving the notice, and that by "sale" is meant a contract by which the vendor transfers to the vendee the title to the property; that an agreement for the purchase and sale of the premises does not constitute a "sale" as contemplated by the terms of the lease, nor as defined by the laws of this state.

To again refer to the clause of the lease providing for the cancellation thereof, we find "that the above notice of cancellation shall only be given in the event that the lessor, its successors or assigns, intend to erect a new building on the premises, or shall have disposed of said premises by sale or ground lease." While in this proceeding we are directly concerned with only that portion of said clause wich provides that notice of cancellation shall be given in the event that the lessor shall have disposed of said premises by sale, yet by reference to the whole clause above quoted we are enabled to ascertain the real intention of the parties upon the subject of the cancellation of the lease. Reading the whole clause, we ascertain that the parties with some considerable care provided that the lease might be canceled in case the lessor decided to construct a new building upon the premises, or should dispose of the land by ground lease, or should dispose of it by sale. It was the evident intent of the parties to leave the owner free to sell said premises, or to erect a new building thereon, or to rent the ground upon which the present building stood, unhampered by said lease, but, so long as the premises remained in the condition in which they were at the date of the lease, the lessee should occupy the same under the terms thereof. From the context of the lease, there is nothing that would indicate to us that the parties intended to restrict the lessor's right to cancel the lease to an absolute sale of the same. It is true the word "sale" is used by the parties, but by the use of this term the parties may well have intended an agreement of sale as well as an absolute sale. As was said by the court in the Estate of Goetz, 13 Cal. App. 198, 109 Pac. 145:

> "It is true that in the contract in question the word 'sold' was used, and that Chapman went into possession of the property and wrecked some of the buildings. But it is conceded, as of course it must be, that the word 'sold' does not conclusively show a present conveyance."

Again in Boardman Co. v. Petch, 186 Cal. 476, 199 Pac. 1047, referring to the word "sale," the court says:

> "It is not a word of fixed and invariable meaning. * * * It may be given a narrow or broad meaning as may be indicated by the context or the surrounding circumstances. * * *"

In Walti v. Gaba, 160 Cal. 324, 116 Pac. 963, we find the following language used by the Supreme Court:

> "It is true that the writing states that 'I have this day sold, etc.,' but the use of the word sold or the word bought does not always import a present sale, but such words are frequently used where the parties in fact intend only an agreement to sell. Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 76 Cal. 218, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199, 18 Pac. 248; Anderson v. Read, 106 N. Y. 344, 13 N. E. 292; McLaughlin v. Piatti, 27 Cal. 458; Elgee Cotton Cases, 22 Wall. (U. S.) 180, 22 L. Ed. 863."

From these authorities we are satisfied that by the use of the word "sale" in a contract the parties may intend an absolute sale or an agreement of sale, depending in a great measure upon the context of the instrument in which it is used and the surrounding circumstances of the parties. We are satisfied that in the lease under consideration the parties thereto used the word "sale" to refer either to an absolute sale of the premises or an agreement to sell the same.

We might here call attention to a number of cases brought to recover broker's commissions upon the sale of real property, where the courts have invariably held that the broker has made a sale when he has merely secured an agreement from the purchaser to buy the property. Shainwald v. Cady, 92 Cal. 83, 28 Pac. 101; Gunn v. Bank of California, 99 Cal. 349, 33 Pac. 1105; Jauman v. McCusick, 166 Cal. 517, 137 Pac. 254; U. S. Farm Land Co. v. Darter, 42 Cal. App. 292, 183 Pac. 696.

Appellants rely mainly upon the two cases of Lewis v. Agoure, 8 Cal. App. 146, 96 Pac. 327, and Cross v. Ramdullah (C. C. A.) 274 Fed. 762. From an examination of these two cases we are of the opinion that neither of them can be considered an authority in support of appellant's contention. In the case of Lewis v. Agoure, supra, a lease had been entered into between the predecessors of the plaintiff and the defendant, containing a clause that the lease might be declared null and void at the option of the lessors in the event they should sell the leased property during the existence of the lease. They sold the property to one Wolff, who in turn sold the same to plaintiff. The lessors, Wolff and plaintiff, joined in a notice to the defendant declaring the lease canceled and demanding the possession of the property. The defendant refused to deliver possession of the property, contending that the option to cancel the lease could not be exercised because it was a collateral contract not running with the land, and, the covenantees having conveyed the property without exercising the right, they no longer had any interest in the premises, and could not give the notice provided to be given. The court held that the notice given was sufficient to terminate the lease, and the fact that the lessors no longer held the title was not material, since the option was not to be exercised until a sale was made. The sale under consideration was an absolute sale, and the question as to the right of the lessors to cancel the lease under a mere agreement of sale did not arise in that case.

In Cross v. Ramdullah, supra, there were four leases, executed about the same time. They each contained a clause similar to that in the lease in the present case. After their execution, a contract was entered into between the lessor and a third party named

Obear, whereby the lessor agreed to sell the property to Obear for a consideration, $5,000 of which was to be paid in cash, and the balance of $53,029.40 in deferred payments. The title was to be free and clear of incumbrances, excepting these four leases. In this case the court said:

> "From a careful scrutiny of these agreements, it is obvious that it was not the purpose or intent of the parties to make a present sale of the lands, and, further, that it was neither their design nor purpose at any time to disturb the possession of the lessees, even in the event of a completed sale in pursuance of the agreements. Furthermore, it was problematical whether the agreements would ever terminate in a consummated sale by transfer of the title, but in any event the lessees were not to be disturbed, for they were expressly excepted from the assurance against incumbrances."

From this language it is evident that the court was of the opinion that whether the agreements between the parties contemplated a present sale, or merely an agreement of sale, that it was neither their design nor purpose at any time to disturb the possession of the lessees, and it therefore held that a notice given by the lessors to cancel the lease was ineffectual.

It is true that there can be found language in each of these decisions which would support the contention of appellant, but in our opinion this language was not necessary for the decision of the questions involved in either case, and therefore these cases cannot in our opinion be considered as authority upon the question before us.

We therefore conclude that the word "sale" in said lease, wherein it is provided that notice of cancellation shall only be given in event that the lessor shall dispose of said premises by sale, is used in its broad and general meaning and refers either to a present sale or an agreement of sale, and that the lessor, having entered into such an agreement of sale and given the notice required by said lease for its cancellation, the rights of the defendant in said lease, or in or to the premises described therein, were thereby terminated.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

POMPER v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY, et al. (L. A. 7681.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 9, 1923. Rehearing Denied August 9, 1923.)

1. Certiorari 🔑5(1)—Judgment in action to quiet title declaring title in plaintiff held interlocutory.

In an action to quiet title and to recover the rents and profits, a judgment declaring the legal title to be in plaintiff, but reserving for future determination the amount of rents and profits due from defendant, held an interlocutory judgment reviewable on appeal from final judgment under Code Civ. Proc. § 956; and hence an order granting a new trial of such interlocutory judgment, even if erroneous, will not be disturbed on certiorari.

2. Appeal and error 🔑80(4)—Generally decree fixing liability but not amount thereof held not "final decree."

Generally, where a decree fixing the liability and rights of the parties refers the case to a subordinate tribunal for a judicial purpose, such as the statement of an account upon which a further decree is to be entered, the decree is not such a final decree as would be appealable.

Isaac Pacht and Rudolph & Warne, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, C. J. This is a proceeding on certiorari to review an order of the respondent court granting a new trial in the action of Pomper v. Behnke. The application is based upon the claim that the judgment rendered in the action, upon which the motion for a new trial was based, was an interlocutory and not a final judgment, and for that reason it is claimed the court had no jurisdiction to grant the motion for a new trial, which is only appropriate, it is claimed, after the entry of the final judgment in the action. The respondent claims that the judgment rendered by the trial court was a final judgment, and that the motion for new trial having been made after due notice and within due time, was within the jurisdiction of the trial court.

[1] It appears from the record certified to this court that the decision in Pomper v. Behnke turned upon the effect of a deed executed by Fritz Pomper to his wife, Emilia Pomper. The difficulty arises from the fact that Fritz Pomper on September 25, 1881, at Chemnitz, Germany, married a woman named Emilia Lenk; on August 26, 1896, at Chicago, Fritz Pomper, with due formalities, married Emilia Lenk, another woman of the same name as his first wife. Thereafter he lived with the second Emilia Lenk, and on September 20, 1915, executed and acknowledged a deed of gift to the property involved in this action "to Emilia Pomper, my wife." In June, 1918, Emilia Pomper of Los Angeles (the second wife) conveyed the property in question to defendant Behnke, who thereafter conveyed it to the defendant Lena Heinze. The action of Pomper v. Behnke was begun September 29, 1920, by the first Emilia Pomper to quiet the plaintiff's title to the land in question and to recover the rents, issues, and profits thereof. The trial court rendered a judgment which was entitled "Interlocutory Judgment and Decree," declaring that the legal title to the property in question was in Emilia Pomper, the first wife, although it was apparent that the deed was delivered to the second Emilia Pomper, who was living with Fritz Pomper upon the property in question, by whom it was occupied for about 18 years as the home of the reputed husband and wife; the first Emilia Pomper having during all this period resided in Germany. The so-called interlocutory judgment expressly reserved for future determination the question of the amount of the rents, issues, and profits to be paid by the respective defendants to the plaintiff therein because of the use and occupation of the premises during the 18 years preceding the commencement of the action, and also from the date of the action to the rendition of the final decree.

While it is true that the so-called interlocutory judgment purported to settle the basic issue involved in the case, it expressly left for future determination the rights of the parties with relation to the rents, issues, and profits, which was one of the issues raised by the complaint, as the plaintiff prayed for judgment for the value thereof.

[2] The general rule is that where a decree is made fixing the liability and rights of the parties which refers the case to a master or subordinate tribunal for a judicial purpose, such, for instance, as the statement of an account, upon which a further decree is to be entered, the decree is not final. 2 Cal. Juris, §§ 19 and 20, p. 142; California National Bank v. Stateler, 171 U. S. 447, 19 Sup. Ct. 6, 43 L. Ed. 233; Clement v. Duncan (Cal. Sup.) 215 Pac. 1025; Doudell v. Shoo, 159 Cal. 448, 453, 114 Pac. 579.

It is clear, then, that the judgment was in fact as well as name an interlocutory judgment and was not appealable, nor do the proceedings upon a motion for new trial laid down in the Code apply to such a judgment.

This, however, is not determinative as to the question involved in this proceeding. The very fact that the judgment in question was interlocutory left the whole case before the court for final adjudication, and even if it be conceded that the order vacating the interlocutory judgment and granting a new trial was erroneous, it was but an order in the exercise of its jurisdiction over the cause and the parties, to be corrected, if need be, upon an appeal from the final judgment in the action. Code Civ. Proc., § 956.

The order is affirmed.

ANGLO-CALIFORNIA TRUST CO. et al. v. OAKLAND RYS. et al. (S. F. 10758.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 6, 1923. Rehearing Denied Aug. 3, 1923.)

Appeal and error 🔑412—Appeal dismissed where attorney signing notice of appeal not attorney of record.

Where the attorney who signed the notice of appeal and prepared the transcript was not the attorney of record and there had been no substitution, a motion to dismiss the appeal will be granted.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the Anglo-California Trust Company and others against the Oakland Railways, a corporation, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant named appeals. Appeal dismissed without prejudice.

Werner Olschewski, of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. C. McKinstry, McKinstry, Haber & Firebaugh, Cushing & Cushing, and Garret W. McEnerney, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the attorney who signed the notice of appeal and prepared the transcript was not the attorney of record, and that there had been no substitution of attorneys is granted on the authority of Harrigan v. Bolte, 67 Cal. xix, 8 Pac. 184.[1]

(August 2, 1923.)

Application to modify order of dismissal herein by providing that the dismissal is without prejudice to another appeal. Inasmuch as the appeal was dismissed because of lack of authority of attorney to file notice of appeal, therefore, in effect, no notice of appeal whatever has been filed. The order heretofore made is modified to provide that the dismissal is without prejudice.

FIDELITY & CASUALTY CO. OF NEW YORK et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (L. A. 7477.)

1. Master and servant 🔑347—Accepted interpretation of terms "employee" and "independent contractor" not altered by Constitution.

The accepted interpretation of the terms "employee" and "independent contractor" defined by Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 8(b), has not been altered by Const. art. 20, § 21, nor by the amendment of that section in 1918.

2. Master and servant 🔑367—Relation dependent on control of method of work; "employee;" "independent contractor."

The determinative factor in determining whether one is an employee or an independent contractor is usually found in the solution of the question, Who has the power of control, not as to the result of the work only, but as to the means and method by which such result should be accomplished?

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé; Independent Contractor.]

3. Master and servant 🔑367—Motor truck driver furnishing truck under contract with transporter of freight held an independent contractor, and not an employee, within Compensation Act.

Under a contract between a transporter of freight by motor trucks and decedent, providing that the former employed decedent together with a truck described for a specified period, that decedent agreed to furnish the truck, make repairs, pay operating expenses, including driving, and to make one trip between terminal points each day, for which he was to receive not less than a specified rate per hundred pounds, with a guaranty of not less than a specified sum per month, that the transporter agreed to render services in providing the loads, freight, and shipping, in the billing and collecting of charges, and in loading, unloading, distributing, and assembling of the loads for which he was to receive a specified recompense from the decedent, and that the contract was transferable subject to the approval of the transporter, held, that decedent was an independent contractor, and not an employee, within Workmen's Compensation Act, § 8 (b).

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Velma D. Edwards and others for the death of Guy W. Edwards, opposed by M. Haydis, employer, and the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, insurer. An order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation, and the insurer and employer bring certiorari. Award annulled.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

MYERS, J. This is a proceeding in certiorari to review an award of compensation for the death of one Guy W. Edwards, who was killed on November 3, 1921, by the overturning of a motor truck which he was driving while in the course of his occupation. The only question presented upon this review is whether decedent was an employee of the petitioner Haydis, or whether he was an independent contractor.

Haydis carried on the business of transporting freight by motor trucks between Los Angeles and San Diego. In September, 1921, decedent bought a truck, and on October 22, 1921, entered into a written contract with Haydis to carry freight for him between San Diego and Los Angeles. By its terms Haydis, the party of the first part, "hereby engages and employs the exclusive services of the party of the second part [decedent] together with and to operate and run" the motor truck and trailer therein described for the purpose of transporting freight for the party of the first part for a specified period of 14 months. Decedent agreed to furnish the truck and trailer, keep them in repair, pay all operating expenses, including the driving, and to make one trip between Los Angeles and San Diego, or between San Diego and Los Angeles, each 24 hours, unless detained by breakdowns, wrecks, or causes that could not reasonably be guarded against. He was to receive not less than 40 cents per hundred pounds for freight carried, Haydis guaranteeing him an average of not less than $700 a month. At the end of each month a balance between the receipts and the guaranteed compensation was to be struck. Haydis was to provide the loads of freight shipped, to furnish warehouses, and assume all responsibility of the billing and collecting of charges, for which he was to be paid by decedent 15 per cent. of his gross receipts. At the option of decedent (which he exercised) Haydis was to assume and perform all services in connection with the loading, unloading, distributing, and assembling of the loads, and was to have the use of the truck for that purpose, and was to be paid $50 per month by decedent for those services. It was provided that when "trip prices" were received the weight of the load should have no bearing on the amount decedent was to receive for it, that payment for the "services rendered herein" by decedent should be made between the 1st and 10th of each month, and that Haydis should furnish decedent with duplicate trip sheets showing the amount of all shipments. The contract was transferable to a third party, subject to the approval of Haydis, and provided that it was "understood at this time that there are no other agreements, either written or verbal, between the parties hereto." It was agreed upon the hearing that the services rendered were governed exclusively by the contract, and it appeared in evidence that the decedent had operated exclusively thereunder from the time of the making of the contract to the time of his death, and that he had not been engaged in the trucking business except during the few weeks intervening between the purchase of this truck and the making of the contract.

[1] The distinction between an employee and an independent contractor under the Workmen's Compensation Act has been considered by this court on numerous occasions. It is settled that the accepted interpretation of those terms has not been altered by the addition of section 21, art. 20, of the Constitution, nor by the amendment of that section in 1918. Pacific G. & E. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 180 Cal. 497, 181 Pac. 788; Flickenger v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 181 Cal. 425, 184 Pac. 851, 19 A. L. R. 1150; Employers' Liability Assurance Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 187 Cal. 615, 618, 203 Pac. 95. The Workmen's Compensation Act defines an independent contractor as one "who renders service, other than manual labor, for a specified recompense for a specified result, under the control of his principal as to the result of his work only and not as to the means by which such result is accomplished." Stats. 1917, p. 831, § 8 (b). The Legislature in including the phrase "other than manual labor" in this definition attempted to place an unconstitutional restriction upon the accepted and settled meaning of the terms, and the definition is therefore to be considered for the purpose hereof as if it read: "One who renders service for a specified recompense for a specified result, under the control of his principal as to the result of his work only, and not as to the means by which such result is accomplished." Flickenger v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra.

[2] In determining in any given case whether a person was an employee or an independent contractor there are usually present various circumstances which are persuasive to one conclusion and other circumstances persuasive to the opposite conclusion. But an analysis of the cases makes it plain that the determinative factor is usually found in the solution of the question: Who has the power of control, not as to the result of the work only, but as to the means and method by which such result is accomplished? In Luckie v. Diamond Coal Co., 41 Cal. App. at page 480, 183 Pac. at page 183, after an extensive review of the cases, the court said:

> "The accepted doctrine is that, where the essential object of the employment is the performance of work, the relation of master and servant does not exist unless the employer retains the right to direct the mode and manner in which the job shall be done; or, in other words, not only what shall be done, but how it shall be done. Labatt on Master and Servant, § 64; Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721. 'The chief consideration which determines one to be an independent contractor is the fact that the employer has no right of control as to the mode of doing the work contracted for.' Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 99, 78 Pac. 337, 339. He is deemed to be the master who has the supreme choice, control, and direction of the servant, and whose will the servant represents, not merely in the ultimate results of the work, but in all the details. The legal test for the determination of the question is stated by Thompson as follows: 'An independent contractor, within the meaning of this rule, is one who renders service in the course of an occupation, representing the will of his employer only as to the result of his work, and not as to the means by which it is accomplished.' * * * 1 Thompson on Negligence, §§ 621, 622."

See, also, Barton v. Studebaker Corp., 46 Cal. App. 707, 717, 189 Pac. 1025, and cases there cited; Flickenger v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra; Pryor v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 186 Cal. 169, 198 Pac. 1045.

[3] Respondents contend that the instant case comes within the rules applied in Eng-Skell Co. v. Industrial Accident Comm., 44 Cal. App. 210, 186 Pac. 163, and Press Publishing Co. v. Industrial Accident Comm., and General Accident, etc., Corp. v. Industrial Accident Comm. (Cal. Sup.) 210 Pac. 820, in each of which cases the applicant was held to be an employee, and not an independent contractor. The former of those cases is radically different from the case at bar. In that case the injured man was employed, together with the use of his truck, not to make certain trips designated in the contract, nor to transport certain specified freight between specified terminals for a compensation dependent upon the results accomplished by him, as in the instant case, but was employed to furnish the services of himself and his truck each day from 8 a. m. until 6 p. m., and to do within those hours whatever he should be directed by his employer to do. Under his contract, if he presented himself and his truck for work from 8 until 6 he was entitled to his pay, regardless of whether he was given any work to do on that day or not. In the instant case it was immaterial whether the decedent worked 5 hours or 15 hours during the 24. If he got through with a load of freight he was entitled to be paid. If he did not get through with it from one terminal to the other he was entitled to no pay, even though he may have been working at that job the whole 24 hours. The determinative factor in the Eng-Skell Case was "that in the performance of such service and the use of said truck Rogers [the applicant] was at all times under the control and direction of the Eng-Skell Company." The two cases of Press Publishing Co. and General Accident, etc., Corp., more nearly approach in their facts the case at bar. In each of those cases the applicant was employed and paid not for the rendition of services during specified hours, but rather for the accomplishment of certain specified results. The decision of this court in each of those cases holding that the applicant was an employee rather than an independent contractor was grounded upon the circumstance that it was an admitted fact in each case that the employer had the power to discharge him at any time, and therefore had the power to control him, not only with respect to the results to be accomplished, but also with respect to the manner and method of their accomplishment. This court said with respect to one of those employers:

> "This power of the employer to terminate the employment at any time is a strong circumstance tending to show the subserviency of the employee, since it is incompatible with the full control of the work usually enjoyed by an independent contractor. Perhaps no single circumstance is more conclusive to show the relationship of an employee than the right of the employer to end the service whenever he sees fit to do so."

With respect to the other employer it said:

> "The circumstances attending the hiring of Benefiel [the applicant] warrant the inference that he was subject to the direction and control of the Press Publishing Company in the performance of his work. The most significant fact in this regard, and one which points towards the relation of employee rather than to the status of an independent contractor, is the fact that Benefiel was hired on the same terms as the other carriers, and the Press Publishing Company had the right to exercise the same direction and control over Benefiel as it did over the other carrier boys, concededly employees. * * * One of the means of ascertaining whether or not this right to control exists is the determination of whether or not, if instructions were given, they would have to be obeyed."

Applying this test to the case at bar, let us suppose that Haydis had said to the decedent, "You must start each trip not later than 7 a. m., and must not drive at a greater rate than 10 miles per hour during any part of the trip." If the decedent had been an employee it would have been his plain duty to obey those instructions. But it is clear that under his contract he was under no obligation so to do. Or suppose Haydis had said, "You must start not earlier than 10 a. m., and must complete your trip within 8 hours thereafter." If decedent had been an employee it would have been his duty to obey this instruction. But such was not his duty under the contract herein. If Haydis had directed decedent to follow a certain route in making these trips, and decedent had perferred a different route, can any one doubt that under their contract the right and power to select the route was vested in decedent? Under the contract decedent was responsible to Haydis only as to the result of the work to be accomplished, namely, the transportation of one load of freight between the two terminals specified during each 24 hours. The contract herein was for the definite term of 14 months, and no right was reserved therein to Haydis to terminate it prior to that time for any cause whatsoever. It has been suggested that, if the decedent had violated his contract, Haydis could then have terminated it, from which it is argued that Haydis had the power of coercion and control over decedent; but it is equally true that, if Haydis had violated his part of the contract, decedent would have had an equal right to terminate it, and it could just as well be argued, so far as this aspect of the contract is concerned, that decedent had the power of control over Haydis.

The circumstance that under the contract decedent was to render nondelegable personal services may be persuasive, but it is in no sense conclusive or determinative. Contracts for the rendition of nondelegable personal services are of common occurrence, which do not constitute the contractor an employee; for example, the ordinary contracts between attorney and client. The same may be said of the use of the phrase "engages and employs."

In Shearman and Redfield on Negligence it is said:

> "The true test of a 'contractor' would seem to be that he renders the service in the course of an independent occupation, representing the will of his employer only as to the result of his work, and not as to the means by which it is accomplished." 6th Ed. § 164.

Respondents emphasize the phrase "in the course of an independent occupation," and argue that the decedent was not pursuing an independent occupation because he was not doing hauling for any one else, and was not permitted so to do under the provisions of his contract for the term thereof. This is a non sequitur. The question whether or not one is pursuing an independent occupation does not depend upon whether he is serving one person or many persons, but whether in the pursuit of his occupation he is acting upon his own behalf or as the servant of another. This is pointed out by the authors last quoted from in the same section:

> "If he never serves more than one person there is usually a presumption that he has no independent occupation; but this presumption is not conclusive. A single large railroad company, for example, might find work enough for a contractor to occupy his whole lifetime, yet leave him to work in perfect independence, accepting the results of his labor without ever interfering with his choice of the mode and instruments of working. On the other hand, one may have many employers within a short space of time, yet be a mere servant to each of them in turn. * * * The one indispensable element of his character as an independent contractor is that he must have contracted to do a specified work and have the right to control the mode and manner of doing it."

Decedent had been working with his truck a little over a month before making this contract.

The question of the burden of proof is wholly immaterial herein, for the reason that the facts are all in evidence, and the evidence is without conflict. It was stipulated at the hearing that the services rendered were governed exclusively by the written contract which is in evidence. The question whether the decedent was an employee or an independent contractor is thus a pure question of law, to be resolved from the terms of the contract itself, considered in the light of the situation of the parties. But if we go further, and consider what was done by them in carrying it out, there is no evidence that Haydis ever exercised any control over the truck while it was being operated by decedent. Mrs. Edwards testified that it was understood that decedent should not carry any one else upon the truck. But she immediately explained this statement by saying:

> "I mean—as I understood it no insurance would be good in any way if there was any one outside, or any one else driving."

There is no evidence that Haydis ever demanded, or even suggested, that decedent should not carry any one else upon the truck. Neither is there any evidence that Haydis ever made any demand or request or suggestion with respect to the mode of operation of the truck by decedent.

By the contract herein Haydis also agreed to render services in providing the loads, freight, and shipping, in the billing and collecting of charges, and in the loading, unloading, distributing, and assembling of the loads, for which he was to receive a specified recompense from decedent. It might therefore be argued with almost equal justice that under this contract Haydis was the employee and decedent was the employer. But taking the contract herein by its four corners, and considering it in the light of the situation of the parties, and in the light of what was done by each of them in its performance, our conclusion is that the decedent was "under the control of his principal as to the result of his work only, and not as to the means by which such result is accomplished," and was therefore an independent contractor.

The award is annulled.

We concur: WILBUR, C. J.; KERRIGAN, J.; WASTE, J.

LAWLOR, J. (dissenting). Upon the hearing before the Industrial Accident Commission respondent Mrs. Edwards, decedent's widow, testified: That from the time he made the contract decedent operated exclusively under it. That he did not solicit or convey goods of any sort from any terminal other than that of Haydis and the Truck Owners & Shippers, Inc. That the money for the freight decedent hauled was collected through Haydis' office, and that from time to time decedent was paid money by Haydis. That decedent did not have any one drive the truck for him after he entered into the agreement. That he drove to Los Angeles and back alone. That she did not remember of any representative of Haydis ever going with him. That "It was understood that he was not to carry any one else; no one else was to go with him. I mean—as I understood it, no insurance would be good in any way if there was any one outside, or any one else driving. That is one reason he never took me to Los Angeles." That before decedent bought the truck he was not in the trucking business, but worked for a dairy. It was agreed upon the hearing that the services rendered were governed exclusively by the contract.

Petitioners emphasize the circumstances that decedent owned his own truck, took care of it himself and paid for its upkeep; that Haydis exercised no control over the manner or method of hauling the freight; that decedent traveled alone, and was his own master in operating the truck. Three cases are cited and especially relied upon as determining that under the facts shown decedent was an independent contractor. In Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721, one Stevens was engaged in "teaming and grading," and furnished teams, wagons, and drivers for hauling material, at the rate of $6 a day for a team, wagon, and driver. His agreement with the hirer in question did not cover any definite period of time, nor designate the number of loads to be hauled, but it was agreed each wagon should work 8 hours a day. The hirer's foreman gave directions in the matter of what materials should be hauled. Stevens drove one wagon himself, and the money for all the drivers was paid to him, he in turn paying the others. It was held that, as the contract was not for Stevens' personal services, but for teams, wagons, and drivers, and as the hirer only had a limited control over the work, Stevens was an independent contractor.

In Flickenger v. Industrial Accident Commission, 181 Cal. 425, 184 Pac. 851, 19 A. L. R. 1150, the decedent for whose death compensation was claimed was engaged in the "truck business," taking calls from the public at large. He was engaged to haul a quantity of hay for Flickenger. There was no definite agreement as to the time within which the work should be done or as to the price. The decedent suited his own convenience as to the manner and time of loading his truck, being expected merely to do a full day's work each day. He was held to be an independent contractor. In Hull v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. App.) 206 Pac. 1014, the petitioner had a dairy in Lankershim, and contracted with the injured party, Ramgren, who was engaged in the trucking business, to carry a quantity of milk to Los Angeles each day at a specified rate. This service did not prevent Ramgren from using any time not occupied in transporting the milk to do hauling for other persons. He paid for the upkeep of the truck, and if anything happened to it he was required to secure other means of transportation. The petitioner had no control over the route taken or the manner of operation of the truck. The court held Ramgren to be an independent contractor.

As stated in the main opinion, respondents contend the case presents a closer analogy to Eng-Skell Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 44 Cal. App. 210, 186 Pac. 163, and the late cases of Press Publishing Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission and General Accident, etc., Corp. v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 210 Pac. 820, wherein a single opinion was rendered. In the former case, in which a petition for a hearing in this court was denied, the Eng-Skell Company entered into an agreement in writing with one Rogers, who owned a truck, whereby the truck and driver were to be supplied to petitioner for the purposes of its business daily between the hours of 8 a. m. and 6 p. m., for a period of six months, for the sum of $1,050 for the entire term, payable in semimonthly amounts of $87.50. Rogers was held to be an employee upon the grounds that the real arrangement between the parties was such that Rogers was himself to be the driver, and was to give his personal services to the Eng-Skell Company; that in the course of such personal service he was not only to be the driver of the truck, but was to attend to all of the details incident to the delivery of the goods; that the service precluded the pursuit of any independent calling by him, and that in the use of the truck he was at all times under the control of the Eng-Skell Company. The relationship was held not to be affected by his use of his own automobile and his payment of its upkeep.

In the two latter cases the injured party was jointly engaged by a creamery and a newspaper, combining the work of going to a ranch in the country after cream and delivering papers along the way. The court held in both instances he was an employee, the control over his movements being found to exist potentially in the facts that in each case his duties were required to be finished by a certain time, and that each hirer had the right to discharge him at any time. It was further held that he did not become an independent contractor because he owned and paid the upkeep of the motorcycle he used in the performance of his duties, nor because he incidentally carried packages for persons along his route, which in no way interfered with his regular work, and was entirely subordinate to it.

This case is distinguishable in certain respects from the cases cited by petitioners. In each of those cases the injured party was engaged in an independent hauling business, and the work he was doing when injured was done in the course of that occupation. Although all his time might temporarily be devoted to one job, he was allowed to engage in other enterprises, and his service was not to be rendered exclusively to one party. In Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, supra, the agreement was not even one for personal services. Here decedent conducted no general trucking business. He secured his truck in September, and on the following October 2 entered into the contract, having before that time worked for a dairy. Under the contract he was to render nondelegable personal services exclusively to Haydis, being thus precluded from following an independent calling. The time during which the contract should extend was limited, and a definite sum was guaranteed decedent, which was equivalent to no more than a promise of wages. Except for the provision that Haydis was to perform certain duties, decedent was required to attend to all the incidents of the transportation of the goods. In these particulars this case is almost identical with Eng-Skell Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra.

The fact that the parties provided for the contingency of an assignment of the contract by decedent might be claimed to indicate that they did not intend to establish the relation of employer and employee. But when the nature of the provision is considered, it is apparent it does not have that effect, for it is merely an agreement for an assignment with the consent of the hirer, such as would be implied by law even in the absence of any clause to that effect. It is well settled that, when an agent assigns a contract without the consent of the principal, the assignee takes merely an opportunity to offer himself to the principal as a substitute for the assignor (Boehm v. Spreckels, 183 Cal. 252, 191 Pac. 5), but also that the burden of any contract may be assigned with the assent of the party entitled to the benefit. Civ. Code, § 1457; Cutting Packing Co. v. Packers' Exchange, 86 Cal. 574, 25 Pac. 52, 10 L. R. A. 369, 21 Am. St. Rep. 63. I do not think the inclusion of this clause is determinative of the nature of the engagement.

The question of Haydis' control over decedent's conduct of the work remains to be considered. In Press Publishing Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra, it was declared:

> "In the absence of any express terms affirming or negating the power of control and direction its existence must be determined from the reasonable inferences to be drawn from all the circumstances surrounding and attending the making and execution of the contract, considered in conjunction with the nature of the contract and the duties ordinarily to be performed thereunder."

As already pointed out, the employers in that case were held to have control of the employee, because the work was required to be finished by a definite time, and because they retained the power to discharge him at any time. In Eng-Skell Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra, it was found the employer did actually control the movements of the employee. In this case Haydis engaged and employed decedent's services exclusively. The word "employ" has a definite legal meaning, and one of the elements involved in an employment is the employer's control over the employee. While it is not "the name parties may give to their contract which determines its character" (Mebius & Drescher Co. v. Mills, 150 Cal. 229, 88 Pac. 917), "legal terms are to be given their legal meaning unless obviously used in a different sense" (Weinreich Estate Co. v. A. J. Johnston Co., 28 Cal. App. 144, 151 Pac. 667).

As the contract in question contained no express reference to the subject of control, it might well be held that by the very use of the term "employs" it was intended Haydis should have control over the movements of decedent, and that decedent was in fact to be his employee. Such a holding would settle the entire matter. But I am of the opinion it also appears from other facts that sufficient control was reserved to Haydis to constitute him an employer by the contract. Decedent was required to make a trip one way each 24 hours. He could not substitute another driver or another truck, and thus could not use his own discretion as to the time or means of transportation. He had no discretion concerning the loading of the truck or the shipping; Haydis was to provide for this without regard to decedent. It was also provided that trip prices might be received, necessarily at Haydis' discretion, for he was to furnish the loads, and that in such an event the weight of the load should not affect the amount received by decedent.

The only matters over which Haydis apparently did not retain express control were as to what roads decedent should travel upon, and in what manner he should perform the acts required in operating the truck. What directions would a driver need more than were given to this one? That some control was actually exercised over the truck while it was being operated by decedent is shown by the testimony of respondent Mrs. Edwards that, because no insurance would be good if anyone rode with decedent, it was understood he should not carry any one else upon the truck. The control actually having been exercised, it is evident it was vested in Haydis; and, the other elements of an employment being present, I am satisfied the finding that decedent was his employee is supported by the evidence, and that the award should be affirmed.

I concur: LENNON, J.

SEAWELL, J. (dissenting). I agree with the conclusion reached by the minority opinion. The question whether decedent, Edwards, was an employee of petitioner Haydis or an independent contractor, as held by the majority opinion, is a question not free from doubt. Elements tending to constitute either relationship are somewhat intermingled in the transaction. The burden of proof rested upon petitioners to prove affirmatively that decedent was an independent contractor. Section 19 (d), Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, provides as follows:

> "The burden of proof lies upon the party holding the affirmative of the issue. The following are affirmative defenses and the burden of proof shall rest upon the employer to establish them:
> "(1) That an injured person claiming to be an employee is an independent contractor or otherwise excluded from the protection of this act where there is proof that such injured person was at the time of his injury actually performing service for the alleged employer."

There being room for substantial doubt as to whether petitioners have sufficiently overcome the burden cast upon them by a showing that decedent was an independent contractor within the purview and meaning of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, the award, in my judgment, should be affirmed.

SCARBOROUGH v. URGO et al.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1170(9)—Refusal to instruct as to burden of proof in collision case held prejudicial error; "miscarriage of justice."

In passenger's action against a motorbus line and the owner of a motortruck, which collided with the bus, refusal to instruct that it was incumbent on plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the accident was caused by omission or neglect of the bus company, and to find for defendant if the evidence was equally balanced, was prejudicial error, resulting in a "miscarriage of justice," within Const. art. 6, § 4½; the instruction being proper under Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 5, and it appearing that several instructions as to the burden of proof had been given on behalf of the owner of the truck, but none on behalf of the bus line, particularly in view of evidence as to the manner in which the collision occurred.

2. Carriers 🔑280(1)—Carriers of passengers for reward must exercise utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons.

Carriers of passengers for reward bind themselves to carry safely those whom they undertake to convey as far as human care and foresight will go; that is, with the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons, and they are responsible for any, even the slightest, negligence.

3. Carriers 🔑316(4)—Burden of proof in passenger's action for injuries stated.

In actions for injuries sustained by passengers as the result of collision, a prima facie case of negligence is made by proving that the passenger was injured while being carried as such, and, this being done, the carrier is called on to rebut the presumption of negligence following from the mere fact of injury, by showing that it exercised a proper degree of care; such presumption, while being evidence, in no degree changing the rule as to burden of proof.

4. Trial 🔑258(1) — All applicable rules of law need not be embodied in requested instruction.

A party cannot be justly required, in requesting an instruction to embody therein all the rules of law applicable to the case, nor even all the rules applicable to the issue of fact or to the principle of law involved in the instruction.

5. Trial 🔑296(7)—Refusal to instruct as to burden of proof in passenger's action for injuries held not cured by another instruction given.

In a passenger's action for injuries sustained in a collision between the motorbus wherein he was riding and a motor truck operated by a codefendant, refusal to instruct, at the request of the bus company, that the burden was on plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the accident was caused by defendant's negligence, held not cured by an instruction in substance telling the jury that, if defendant was without fault, no verdict could be rendered against it.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Sanford C. Scarborough against M. Urgo and the Motor Transit Company.

Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant last named appeals. Reversed.

Haas & Dunnigan and H. L. Dunnigan, all of Los Angeles, for appellant Motor Transit Co.

Miguel Estudillo, of Riverside, and Lloyd Wright, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for Urgo.

SEAWELL, J. On October 4, 1920, appellant, Motor Transit Company, a corporation, a carrier of passengers for reward, was operating a motorbus line upon the public highway connecting the city of Riverside and the city of Los Angeles. Respondent, Sanford C. Scarborough, having paid his fare, took passage on one of appellant's busses at Riverside, westerly bound for Los Angeles. M. Urgo, defendant, was, on said day, operating, as owner a motortruck traveling on said highway in an easterly direction. On a section of said highway known as Valley boulevard, at a point near Walnut, while rounding a curve in the highway, said bus and motortruck collided, inflicting upon respondent injuries of rather a serious nature.

Uncertain as to which was at fault, respondent made both owners of the motor vehicles defendants in an action in the court below, alleging joint negligence. Each answered separately. By the verdict the jury exculpated defendant Urgo, and found against appellant. This appeal is taken by appellant, Motor Transit Company, because of the court's refusal to give the following instruction, or its equivalent, in any part of its charge to the jury:

> "* * * It is incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that such accident was caused by some act of omission or neglect on the part of the Motor Transit Company, and if the evidence is equally balanced in your minds as to the act or neglect of the defendant, Motor Transit Company, then you must find a verdict for the defendant, for otherwise you would not be finding in accordance with the preponderance of the evidence."

It is a fact that the jury was not at any time, so far as appellant's liability was concerned, instructed that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff, or that plaintiff was required to prove his case by a preponderance of the evidence, or, if the evidence in the minds of the jurors appeared to be "evenly balanced," the verdict must be for appellant. As to defendant Urgo, the jury was fully and repeatedly instructed on at least one of the elementary principles of law, to wit, burden of proof, upon which the Code requires that:

> "They are * * * to be instructed by the court on all proper occasions." Code Civ. Proc. § 2061. (Italics ours.)

Certainly it is demonstrated by the record that this case furnished the proper occasion for the giving of the requested instruction. Seven groups of rules of evidence are specifically enumerated in section 2061, Code of Civil Procedure, the fifth of which is:

> "5. That in civil cases the affirmative of the issue must be proved, and when the evidence is contradictory the decision must be made according to the preponderance of evidence; that in criminal cases guilt must be established beyond a reasonable doubt." (Italics ours.)

Respondent does not claim that the portion of the instruction above quoted was an improper instruction to have been given to the jury, but claims that its omission does not constitute ground for reversal on the theory that a miscarriage of justice could not have resulted therefrom. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

[1] We have made a careful examination of all the evidence in the case and also of the entire record and we are fully convinced that this claim cannot be sustained. We would refuse to reverse the case merely because of the refusal or omission of the trial court to instruct the jury as to its duty in case of an "equal balancing" of the evidence provided an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, satisfied us that the evidence so greatly preponderated in favor of the judgment that had the refused instruction been given the verdict would have been and should have been the same.

The paved portion of the highway upon which the collision took place is of a width of 21 feet. The motortruck which is known as a dual-tire truck, was following closely behind another truck of the same general type which was drawing a trailer. Both motortrucks were well loaded with empty fruit boxes extending 10 or 12 feet above the floors or beds of said trucks. The driver of appellant's bus testified that, when he first observed defendant's motortruck, it was 400 feet distant from him and beyond the curve. Defendant Urgo admitted that he did not see the bus until within 20 or 30 feet of it, while several passengers, including plaintiff, stated that they did not see the motortruck until it was practically in collision with the bus. Urgo further stated that he was following about 15 feet behind the first truck, and when it turned to the center of the road to avoid a space in the highway which he described as being near its center and estimated to be 40 to 50 feet long by 3 to 4 feet wide, and which had recently been repaired with a material different in color from the pavement, but which was practically level with the macadam surface, and over which vehicles passed, he turned to the left and the collision occurred. He had not recently traveled this particular road. He admits that he did not observe the repaired space until he was very near it. His movements were guided by the actions of the driver of the truck he was trailing rather than by the exercise of his own sense of observation. While he charged at the outset of his examination that the driver of the bus had turned from his proper position on the road to avoid a rough spot in the highway, he destroyed the force of this testimony during the final moments he occupied the witness stand. We quote from his testimony:

> "The Court: How near was the motor bus to the center of the road at the time of the collision? A. Well, his front end was over towards the road, the center of the road, more than his rear end.
> "The Court: I know, but where was the front end, then, with reference to the center of the road? A. I wouldn't say for sure. It was over the center of the road and I wouldn't say for sure it wasn't. Q. Where was yours? Was yours over the center of the road? A. No, sir. Q. What? A. No, sir. Q. Are you sure of that? A. I am sure of it. Q. But you are not sure whether it was or not? A. No; I won't say for sure. Q. How did you get together? A. I don't know. We just hit together, that is all. * * *
> "Mr. Estudillo: The bus didn't hit you, did it? A. Well, I don't know whether it hit me or whether I hit him."

The above and other portions of his testimony not given here practically amount to an admission that he was at fault. The driver of the bus testified that he was at all times on the side of the road assigned him by law, and that Urgo suddenly swerved from the side of the road he should have held, crossed the center line, and struck the bus immediately back of the driver's seat, with resultant injury. He claimed that both right wheels of the bus were off the pavement and on the dirt portion of the roadway to his right as far as the physical conditions of the road would permit. His testimony to the effect that he was well on the side of the road he should have traveled is corroborated by three or four persons who were passengers on the bus, and this testimony is not disputed by a single witness except defendant, Urgo, who finally admitted that he did not know how the collision occurred. Respondent, Scarborough, did not seem to be very clear as to the exact position of the truck at the moment of collision, but placed it near the center of the road, or as he stated later, the left wheels were near the center of the road at the moment of impact. The rate of speed at which the bus was traveling was estimated by respondent at 35 miles an hour, and by the other witness from 32 to a rate less than 30 miles an hour. The motortruck was traveling at a rate of speed of about 15 miles per hour. It is not claimed, however, that the rate of speed traveled by either vehicle was a contributing factor to the collision.

[2, 3] The rule is that carriers of passengers for reward bind themselves to carry safely those whom they undertake to convey or carry as far as human care and foresight will go; that is, with the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons, and, of course, they are responsible for any, even the slightest, negligence. Kline v. Santa Barbara Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 741, 90 Pac. 125. In this class of cases a prima facie case of negligence is made out by proving that the passenger was injured while being carried as such, and, this being done, the carrier is called upon to rebut or overcome a presumption of negligence that follows from the mere fact of injury, by showing, if it can, the exercise of that degree of care which will excuse it under the rule of law above stated. Such a presumption is evidence in the case, but it has no greater or different effect than the testimony of witnesses, and in no degree changes the rule as to the burden of proof, viz. the burden of producing a preponderance of evidence. That burden does not shift from side to side on the trial of a case, but constantly remains with the party having the affirmative of the issue, who, in this case, is the plaintiff. All that is required of the defendant is to produce evidence sufficient to offset the effect of a plaintiff's showing. He is not required to offset it by a preponderance of the evidence. Valente v. Sierra Ry. Co., 151 Cal. 534, 91 Pac. 481. As is said in Sweeney v. Erving, 228 U. S. 233, 33 Sup. Ct. 416, 57 L. Ed. 815, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 905 (see, also, Rose's U. S. Notes), the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur, where it applies, does not convert the defendant's general issue into an affirmative defense. When all the evidence is in the question for the jury is whether the preponderance is with the plaintiff." See, also, Kahn v. Triest-Rosenberg Cap Co., 139 Cal. 341, 73 Pac. 164; Cody v. Market St. Ry. Co., 148 Cal. 90, 82 Pac. 666; Patterson v. San Francisco Co., 147 Cal. 178, 81 Pac. 531; Morgan v. So. Pac. Co., 45 Cal. App. 229, 187 Pac. 74; Onell v. Chappell, 38 Cal. App. 375, 176 Pac. 370; Bonneau v. North Shore Railroad Co., 152 Cal. 406, 93 Pac. 106, 125 Am. St. Rep. 68.

[4] It is expressly conceded by counsel for respondent, and it must, we think, be conceded by us, that the refused instruction correctly states the law in so far as it purports to state it. It properly informs the jury in effect that the burden is upon the plaintiff to prove the negligence complained of by a preponderance of the evidence, and that this burden still remains upon him, even though he has shown that he was injured by a collision between two vehicles while being carried as a passenger in one of them. This is the law. The objections to the refused instructions, upon analysis, resolve themselves into two criticisms: (1) That it ignores the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur; (2) that it is misleading. The first objection is not, we think, a valid ground for the refusal of the instruction. A party cannot be justly required, in requesting an instruction, to embody therein all the rules of law applicable to the case, nor even all the rules applicable to the issue of fact, or to the principle of law involved in the instruction. 38 Cyc. 1598. If the requested instruction is a correct statement of the law of the case, in so far as it purports to cover the same, and there is evidence to which it is properly applicable, it should be given, unless it is covered by other instructions given, or unless it is so worded as to be likely to mislead the jurors. This precise point was determined in Stein v. United Railroad, 159 Cal. 368, 372, 113 Pac. 663. There defendant, appealing from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, complained of the refusal of the trial court to give certain instructions requested by it upon the law of contributory negligence. This refusal was sought to be justified on the ground that the requested instruction ignored the "last clear chance" rule. This court determined that the last clear chance rule was properly applicable to the evidence in that case, but said:

> "It is no sufficient answer to appellant's objection to the court's refusal to give the requested instructions that they ignored the doctrine of the 'last clear chance.' To announce such a rule would be to hold that each instruction must express all the law on the subject considered. The jurors were elsewhere in the charge of the court fully informed regarding the doctrine of 'last clear chance.' * * *"

Substituting the words "res ipsa loquitur" in place of the words "last clear chance," the quoted statement applies with precision in its entirety to the question here under consideration. It is true that the "last clear chance" rule is not, strictly speaking, a modification of the contributory negligence rule; but neither is the res ipsa loquitur rule, strictly speaking, a modification of the rule as to the burden of proof. Can it be fairly said that this instruction was likely to mislead the jurors, if it had been given? It did not tell them that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove the particular act or omission of this defendant which was relied upon by him, but merely that it was incumbent upon him to prove "that such accident was caused by some act or omission of neglect." In other words, it told the jurors that, in order to return a verdict against this defendant, they must find from a preponderance of the evidence (which was elsewhere correctly defined in the instructions) that this defendant had been guilty of some negligent act or omission. In Kahn v. Triest-Rosenberg Cap Co., supra, the defendant appealed from a judgment against him for damages for injuries to plaintiff's goods caused by water escaping from a boiler maintained by defendant upon an upper floor in the same building. The court instructed the jury that the mere fact of the overflow of the water from the boiler under the circumstances of the case was prima facie evidence of negligence. It also instructed them that:

> "Unless they, the plaintiffs, have shown that the boiler and apparatus which was used by the defendant were improper appliances to be used, or that they were maintained or used by it in a careless or negligent manner, and unless they have so shown to your satisfaction and by a preponderance of the evidence, you are instructed that you must find for the defendant."

This presents a situation which would have been substantially identical in principle with the situation in the instant case if the trial court had given the instructions which it here refused. It was urged in that case that the two instructions were conflicting, which is the essence of the claim here made in behalf of the respondent. This court said:

> "There was no conflict in the instructions given by the court. * * * It still remained the law that, upon the whole evidence, the plaintiff must have the preponderance in order to succeed."

Each of the following cases also holds, either expressly or by necessary implication, that where the court gives an instruction embodying the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, it should also give one to the effect that the burden of proving his case by a preponderance of the evidence rests upon the plaintiff. Cody v. Market St. Ry. Co., supra; Valente v. Sierra Ry. Co., 151 Cal. 534, 537, 91 Pac. 481; Patterson v. San Francisco, etc., Co., supra; Bonneau v. North Shore R. R. Co., supra; Wyatt v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 170, 175, 103 Pac. 892; Diller v. Northern Cal. Ry. Co., 162 Cal. 531, 537, 123 Pac. 359, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 908; Slaughter v. Goldberg, Bowen & Co., 26 Cal. App. 318, 328, 147 Pac. 90; Weaver v. Carter, 28 Cal. App. 241, 247, 152 Pac. 323.

As to the question of miscarriage of justice. An examination of the instructions given by the trial court makes it apparent that the error in refusing the requested instruction was of much greater consequence than has thus far been made to appear. The jurors were told no less than four different times that before they could return a verdict against the defendant Urgo they must find that the plaintiff has proved his case by a preponderance of evidence. But nowhere in the instructions is there a hint or suggestion that he was required to produce such a preponderance as against the defendant transit company. They were told that:

> "If from the evidence you believe the accident was such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen, had the driver of the motor or passenger bus then used proper care in its management or operation, that affords prima facie evidence, in the absence of explanation, that the accident arose from a want of care on the part of the Motor Bus Company."

And again:

> "If you find that, while the plaintiff was being carried as a passenger by the defendant, the Motor Transit Company, the bus upon which he was a passenger collided with a truck operated by the other defendant, M. Urgo, and that he was injured, then a presumption of negligence arises which throws the burden upon the defendant the Motor Transit Company of showing that the injury was sustained without any negligence on its part, and in the absence of such evidence your verdict should be in favor of the plaintiff. * * *"

(Although counsel have not complained on this ground, it may be noted that the instruction last quoted was open to the objection that it suggested to the jurors that there was an absence of evidence showing that the injury was sustained without any negligence on the part of the transit company, whereas there was in fact a great deal of such evidence in the case.)

The jurors were told no less than four different times, in effect, that the defendant transit company owed to the plaintiff the duty to use the utmost care and diligence of a very cautious person, and that it was bound to carry him safely, as far as human care and human foresight would go. And in immediate juxtaposition thereto they were told that:

> "On the other hand, the defendant Urgo was only required to use ordinary care in driving the automobile."

It is not intended to suggest that these instructions were erroneous or in any way incorrect. But the emphasis which was given to the rules of law embodied in them by their repetition was such as to make the omission of this defendant's requested instruction all the more significant. It should be kept in mind also that at the very outset of the instructions the court said to the jury that:

> "During the instructions you will be told that certain facts must be proved by a preponderance of evidence. That means such evidence as, when weighed with that opposed to it, has more convincing force, and from which it results that the greater probability is in favor of the party [plaintiff in this case] upon whom the burden rests." (Italics ours.)

The jury, naturally, would have understood from this assurance that the burden of proof and its application would be fully covered as to each of the defendants, and if nothing was said by the court as to the burden of proof being with respondent in making his case against appellant, as well as against Urgo, his codefendant, it was for the reason that the burden did not rest upon respondent so far as the appellant was concerned. This was a limitation of appellant's right of defense not warranted by law. Moreover, the rules of the road were stated in the instructions more favorably to the defendant Urgo than is warranted by the law. To be sure, the defendant transit company is not entitled in law to complain of the fact that its codefendant unjustly escaped liability, if such be the fact; but it is, we think, entitled to complain of an incorrect instruction as to the rules of the road applicable to its codefendant because of the circumstance that in determining whether or not the bus driver was negligent, it should have been determined in the light of the fact that he was entitled to assume that the truck driver would obey the rules of the road, and was entitled to act in reliance upon that assumption until something should occur to give him notice to the contrary.

The question whether or not there has been a miscarriage of justice is to be considered not solely with respect to its relationship to the plaintiff but also with respect to the rights of the appealing defendant. It is conceded that under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence herein one or both of the defendants must have been negligent, but it does not follow therefrom that, unless the jurors found against the truck driver, they were obliged to find against the carrier. Plaintiff is not entitled to recover against appellant because of the weakness of his case against his codefendant Urgo, or vice versa. If he recovers at all, it must be upon the strength of the case he is able to make out against either. To entitle him to succeed against appellant, he is held to the law's requirement that the burden of proving his case rests upon him; but it cannot be justly said that the jurors herein found that defendant Urgo was not negligent. The most that can be said in this behalf is that the jurors found that the plaintiff had failed to prove negligence of this defendant by a preponderance of the evidence. The burden was at all times upon the plaintiff to prove his case by such preponderance, and if he failed to do so it was the duty of the jurors to return a verdict for the defendant. If the jurors found that the evidence was evenly balanced as to the negligence of the defendant Urgo, it was their duty to return a verdict in his favor, and if at the same time they found that the evidence was evenly balanced as to the negligence of defendant transit company, it was their duty to return a verdict in its favor.

[5] Respondent insists that the refusal to give the requested instruction was cured by the giving of another, in which it was stated that, although it was true that appellant as a carrier of passengers for reward owed to the plaintiff a greater degree of care than ordinarily obtains between persons having no such contractual relationship as between themselves, or as between one of them and the public, and if the jury found from the evidence that the plaintiff's injuries were approximately caused solely by the negligence of some other person, or if at the time of the collision appellant was operating its bus in a lawful manner, the jury would not be justified in finding a verdict against it. The instruction offered as a substitute did not cure the omission complained of. In substance, it does no more than to tell the jury, what it doubtless knew, that if appellant was without fault no verdict could be rendered against it. Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 113 Pac. 663. It falls far short of instructing the jury on the matter of law requested.

A thorough investigation of the record has convinced us that a preponderance of the evidence was not on the side of the plaintiff as against the defendant transit company. Neither this court nor the law is responsible for the situation that confronts the parties to the action by reason of the conclusion reached by us. Plaintiff and respondent could and should have protected himself from any ground of complaint he may feel that he now has by reason of the elimination of any party to the action by taking an appeal from the judgment in Urgo's favor. Upon the face of the record he should have done so. It was no part of appellant's duty to protect his rights, and, of course, he could not expect he would. By the record which respondent helped to make in the court below, the precise result here announced should have been reasonably anticipated. It is true that plaintiff was injured by the negligence of one of the defendants. But this unfortunate circumstance did not give him a cause of action against an innocent person. The axiom that one must not be permitted to take from another that which he is not entitled to receive is sound, both in law and morals.

Upon a full consideration of all the testimony, as well as the physical facts described by the witnesses, and upon an examination of the entire record, we are of the opinion that appellant was deprived of a substantial right, which in effect amounted to a miscarriage of justice, by the denial of the right, under the significant circumstances of the case, to have the jury instructed that it was incumbent upon plaintiff to prove his case by a preponderance of the evidence against appellant as well as against defendant Urgo.

The judgment is reversed.

SNOW MOUNTAIN WATER & POWER CO. v. KRANER. (S. F. 10221.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 19, 1923. Rehearing Denied July 19, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1075—Error in findings not considered where expressly waived.

The suggestion that the findings are contradictory will not be considered, where appellant states in his opening brief that no reversal is sought on that ground.

2. Work and labor 🔑14(2)—Order to complete dam on angle held not breach of contract for construction on straight line axis.

A contract to construct a dam on a straight line axis between defined lines, subject to reasonable alterations, additions, etc., for which additional compensation was provided, held not terminated by an order to complete the dam on a 44-degree angle, which the evidence showed and the court found was a reasonable alteration, so as to constitute a breach entitling the contractor to abandon the contract and recover the reasonable value of the work done.

3. Work and labor 🔑30(2)—Whether change in construction of dam from straight line axis to 44-degree angle was unreasonable and terminated contract held for trial court.

Whether an order to change the construction of a dam from a straight line axis to a 44-degree angle was unreasonable and so radically material as to terminate the contract and give the contractor the right to recover in quantum meruit for the value of the work done held a question of fact for the trial court.

4. Contracts 🔑303(1)—Mere difficulty or unusual or unexpected expense caused by natural obstacles no excuse for nonperformance of construction contract.

A construction contractor is not absolved from his obligation by natural obstacles intervening, unless they render performance practically impossible; mere difficulties or unusual or unexpected expense not excusing him.

5. Work and labor 🔑14(2)—Contractor held estopped from denying obligation to continue work under oral order changing plans.

A contractor suggesting and accepting an oral order changing the construction of a dam from a straight line axis to a 44-degree angle, beginning exploratory work to locate the new foundations, agreeing to wait for a written order required by the contract until the Railroad Commission consented to the change, and stating, when asked if he would proceed if such order was given, that he would not continue work under the contract at all, waived the written order, the provision for which was for his benefit, and could not assert that the oral order terminated the contract and entitled him to recover the value of the work done; the law not requiring an idle act (Civ. Code, § 3532).

6. Appeal and error 🔑882(17)—Appellant estopped from challenging finding made at his request.

Appellant is estopped from challenging a finding made at his request.

7. Contracts 🔑296—Whether application of compensation clause to extra work would have ruined or benefited contractor held immaterial.

Whether compensation clauses of a contract for the construction of a dam would have ruined the contractor, if applied to extra work necessitated by a change in plans, or whether he would have been benefited by such change held immaterial, where the court found on sufficient testimony that the change was reasonable.

8. Work and labor ⚷14(2)—Contractor held estopped from claiming that contract was in force when order restraining him from continuing work was issued.

A contractor constantly claiming that his contract for the construction of a dam on a straight line axis was terminated by an order to complete it on a 44-degree angle, demanding payment for the extra work on a different basis than that provided in the contract in case of alterations, additions, etc., and finally notifying his foreman to take steps to shut down the work, could not claim that the other party's election to take over the equipment and complete the work, as authorized by the contract in case of the contractor's abandonment thereof, and institution of a suit to restrain him from continuing the work, constituted a breach of an existing contract, so as to entitle him to recover the reasonable value of the work done, though he continued to maintain a small force of men at the dam, especially where he made no effort to show that the restraining order was improvidently granted or to resist the granting of a temporary injunction against removing his equipment and supplies.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by the Snow Mountain Water & Power Company against W. A. Kraner. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. C. Chapman and R. P. Henshall, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, Max Thelen, and Oscar Sutro, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, J. The defendant was engaged in the work of constructing a large cement dam for the plaintiff under a contract by the terms of which, in the event of abandonment of the work by the contractor, plaintiff might take over all tools, equipment, and supplies of the contractor and proceed to complete the structure. Alleging that the defendant had notified it that he declined further to proceed with the performance of his contract and was about to remove the equipment from the work, plaintiff brought this suit to restrain such threatened action. A restraining order was granted, and by stipulation was continued as a temporary injunction. Defendant took the position that the contract had been terminated by an act of the plaintiff. He filed counterclaims and a cross-complaint for the recovery of $873,625, alleged to be the balance due for the reasonable market value of all of the work done at the dam, after crediting plaintiff with the sum of $1,600,825 paid, computing said balance on the basis of the cost of all the work done plus 10 per cent. The trial court found that the defendant had in fact abandoned the contract. Judgment was rendered against the defendant on his counterclaims and cross-complaint, and plaintiff was awarded its costs. No order was made for the continuance of the injunction, since plaintiff had completed the construction of the dam before the determination of the action. This appeal by the defendant followed.

On December 15, 1919, the plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendant for the construction by the latter of a concrete dam across the South Eel river, on a site mentioned in the contract, at the lower end of Gravelly Valley, in Lake county. According to the plans and specifications, the work was to be done within certain delineated and designated lines extending from the north to the south bank of the stream. Prior to entering into the contract, defendant, with his engineers, made a thorough investigation of the dam site, and, in the contract, he agreed to take the ground as he found it. The agreed price for the work called for by the plans and specifications was $1,122,350, with adequate provision for prices and payment for all kinds of additional work which might arise in view of the nature of the construction. It was contemplated by the parties that occasion might arise for a departure from the work designated in such plans and specifications, and the contract provides:

> "The company shall have the right to make, but only by orders in writing, such reasonable alterations, omissions, additions or substitutions in said plans and specifications as the company may deem necessary. The contractor agrees to accede to and carry into effect all such alterations, omissions, additions or substitutions as though they were originally provided for in this contract.
> "In the event of such alterations, omissions, additions or substitutions increasing or decreasing the cost of constructing the said dam there shall be added to, or subtracted from, the amount which the company has agreed hereby to pay to the contractor for the entire work, a sum equal to the difference between the actual cost of the materials and labor entering into such alterations, omissions, additions or substitutions, but not including any portion of the time of the superintendent or office employees, or overhead expenses, except industrial insurance, plus twelve and one-half per cent. as the contractor's profit, and the same cost estimated in the same way of the work or construction which would have been done under the plans and specifications made a part of this contract, had there been no such alterations, omissions, additions or substitutions."

It was stipulated in the contract that the defendant should begin work not later than January 1, 1920, and should have all concrete poured and the dam ready for use in storing water on or before December 1, 1920, and all additional work done and the dam entirely completed on or before February 1, 1921. Immediately upon the execution of the original agreement the defendant commenced the work of constructing the dam. The State Railroad Commission exercised jurisdiction over the work, paying particular attention to the exposure of satisfactory foundations for the construction of the dam before any concrete should be placed thereon. On May 25 defendant was ordered by the consulting engineer of plaintiff in charge of the work to, and he did, change the axis of the dam as shown on the plans and specifications by moving the northerly end thereof westerly 25 feet, for the purpose of avoiding unsatisfactory material. Shortly thereafter, and for several months, defendant was in continual need of financial assistance. On various occasions he applied to the plaintiff, and was furnished by it with sufficient funds with which to proceed with the work. In June, at defendant's request, plaintiff extended the time within which the defendant was to have all concrete poured and the dam ready for use in storing water, to October 1, 1921, and the time within which all additional work should be done and the dam entirely completed, to December 1, 1921.

Defendant's original plan of work was to build the dam from both banks of the river toward the center, but work was prosecuted more diligently on the north end of the structure than on the southerly side. The trial court found that the delay in completing the work at the southerly end of the dam was not caused by any acts of the plaintiff. The real reason for the concentration of work on the northerly end of the structure seems to have been that work at that point was done more easily, and that the pouring of cement could progress more rapidly. The defendant testified that he expected the progress payments at $5 a cubic yard for concrete poured to carry the expense of the work. When defendant finally began work of excavation for the foundation on the south side of the river, difficulty of construction was experienced by reason of the nature of the ground. On October 28, 1920, the axis of the dam was accordingly changed, so that from a point about 590 feet from the northerly end of the structure it would be constructed at an angle of 32 degrees from such point to a large boulder 75 feet high lying on the south side of the river. Defendant was directed to make this change, and to construct a ring of cement and a cut-off wall under the boulder and into the hard rock beyond. This change was considered a more economical and quicker way of building the dam than by completing it on the straight line axis, because of the nature of the ground and the material to be moved. Defendant accepted, and was working under these changed conditions in November, 1920, when torrential rains caused a heavy flood which washed away a large part of the material remaining to be excavated at the south end of the dam and undermined and moved the large boulder referred to some 35 feet out of position. This condition of affairs caused a change of plans which would not have been necessary had the boulder been imbedded in concrete, as was contemplated, or had the full force of the flood not been directed against the south bank by the completed portion of the dam in such manner as to undercut the rock. Engineers testified on the trial that proper methods of construction would have required that the sides of the foundation of the dam should have been excavated first, and the dam built from both ends toward the center, leaving an opening or low point which would have permitted the floods to pass through without damage.

In view of the changed conditions created by the floods, plaintiff verbally ordered the defendant to complete the dam on an angle of approximately 30 degrees. He proceeded with work under said verbal order, and, amongst other matters, constructed a rock wall as part of said work, all under the contract of December 15, 1919. In the latter part of December, owing to the lateness of the season, work was practically shut down until February, 1921, when the defendant notified plaintiff that he would proceed with the construction of the dam under the order of October 28, 1920, unless otherwise ordered. In the meantime, the Railroad Commission approved a plan to return to the straight line axis, and the defendant was ordered in writing to carry out the work on that line. He agreed to do so if work "beyond the lines called for by the original contract" should be paid for under the clause in the original contract providing for alterations, omissions, additions, or substitutions in the work. The plaintiff answered that it stood upon the terms of the contract. Meanwhile a controversy arose between the contractor and the company as to the most feasible manner and best method of completing the dam. The plaintiff advocated and had ordered completion on a straight line axis. The defendant had agreed to go ahead, but insisted that the work be completed on an angle of approximately 44 degrees to avoid the slide caused by the flood, and to run to a buttress rock west of the straight line axis. His opinion prevailed, and on May 21, 1921, he was verbally directed by plaintiff to cease work on the straight line axis and complete the dam on the 44-degree angle. The trial court found that completion of the work on the straight line axis was possible, but not practicable, by reason of the excessive cost which would have been incurred if that course had been followed. By the time the parties agreed to this change in plan of construction, all the material required to be moved by excavation at the south end of the dam upon the straight line axis, as specified on the plans, had been removed. It was now agreed that the exact line of such new angle could not be determined until the foundations upon which the dam would be constructed were exposed, at which time application would be made to the Railroad Commission for authority to proceed along the new lines, and written order given defendant to proceed. Defendant consented and agreed to all these matters. Thereupon he was directed to do certain exploratory work for the purpose of determining the exact location of the new foundation line. In the meantime, defendant's financial backers had become interested in the matter. They questioned whether or not such exploratory work fell within the terms of the contract. The defendant asserted that it did not. Although he had done, and had been paid under the contract for, similar work, he consented to sink certain test pits, but refused to concede that such work came under any of the contract provisions. His attorney advanced the further contention that the unexpected flood had terminated the contract, and declared that it was useless to look to it for any purpose whatever. He wrote to the plaintiff: "The work will have to be done under a new contract." The defendant would, he added, finish the work under the orders of the company at cost plus 12½ per cent. The plaintiff all the while took the position that the contract was still in force, and that all work came under its provisions.

Much correspondence passed between the contractor and the company relating to the work and the manner in which it would be paid for. The defendant was constantly demanding from plaintiff an interpretation of the contract as to method of payment, if he proceed with construction on the 44-degree angle. The plaintiff steadfastly stood upon the terms of the agreement. It notified defendant that a refusal or neglect to perform work thereunder would be taken as a repudiation and breach of the contract entitling it to proceed as it might choose. On June 8 defendant again insisted upon a construction of the contract as to how he was to be compensated for such excavation as might "be necessary to be done in the event the dam is to be completed on a straight line axis," while admitting in the same letter of his attorney that orders had already been issued to him to stop work on the straight line axis and to continue the work on the angle of 44 degrees. He took the position that the contract, if it did still exist, did not require him to proceed on a straight line axis, and declined to admit that such work was called for by the contract, or that it was extra or additional work arising under the contract, or had anything to do with the contract. Under the circumstances, he said, he declined to proceed further upon the dam, and would remove his equipment forthwith and shut down the work. Instructions were forwarded by him to his superintendent at the dam to take such steps. The controversy between the parties was continued. The defendant offered several propositions looking to a settlement of his claims for payment. The plaintiff rejected all of them upon the ground that they were not based upon or measured by the terms of compensation contained in the contract. Defendant, having in the meantime notified plaintiff "in order that there might be no misunderstanding" that he would "not perform work on the angle of the dam under the unit price provision of the contract, or under the provision relating to omissions, alterations, additions or substitutions," on the ground that the character of the work was different from that pertaining to any other portion of the dam, was exceedingly difficult, and not within the contemplation of the parties to the contract when it was entered into, on June 30 served on the plaintiff a demand for the payment of $754,633. This amount he stated he was willing to accept in full for all work done on the Scott dam under the contract of December 15, 1919, and for work done outside of and extraneous to the contract to May 1, 1921. He rendered a separate bill for the month of May. These bills were computed on the cost plus basis for all work done by defendant and were demanded as an additional payment over and above the sums which had already been paid to him by plaintiff under the terms of the agreement. In short, it was another declaration on the part of defendant that he regarded the contract as breached by plaintiff, and that he was entitled to recover the reasonable value of all work done. Immediately after service of this demand, plaintiff instituted this action and procured the restraining order. It took over the equipment at the dam, and finished the work, at a cost of $694,450 over what it had already expended.

[1] The large sums of money involved in this action, and its consequent importance to the parties, led to a minute and comprehensive presentation of the case in the lower court. The trial judge visited and inspected the dam and the premises involved in the action. The evidence taken at the trial, which lasted many days, was brought here in a reporter's transcript of more than 3,000 pages, the points and authorities of the respective parties cover many hundreds of printed pages, and the case was orally argued at length. Counsel, with indefatigable industry, have raised and presented their contentions from every conceivable point of view. Every point raised or remotely suggested by either side has received attention and consideration from the opposing side. Viewed, however, from any and every angle, the appeal presents but one question: Was the contract entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant for the construction of the dam terminated by agreement of the parties and the resulting order given by plaintiff to defendant on May 21, 1921, to complete the dam on an angle of 44 degrees? From our examination and understanding of this voluminous record, we are convinced that the contract was not so terminated and that the finding of the trial court that the defendant abandoned the contract is amply supported by the evidence, and that the judgment must be affirmed. The findings are not attacked beyond a suggestion that they are in part contradictory as to the question of abandonment. As appellant expressly states in his opening brief that "no reversal is sought upon that ground," we will consider the point no further.

[2] In support of the appeal, the appellant contends that it was not he, but the respondent, who breached the contract. On the facts found he contends judgment should have been in his favor. In short, his position is that as the contract between the parties called for the construction of a dam upon a straight line axis between defined lines, and between definite points on the north and south banks of the river, the notification given by respondent on May 21 to quit work on the straight line axis was, in itself, a termination of the contract, and such a breach on the part of the company as to entitle the contractor to recover the reasonable value of all the work done.

Appellant's argument is that the proposed change to the 44-degree angle was unreasonable, and was such a radical change in the nature of construction that it could not have been supposed to have been in the minds of the parties at the time the agreement was entered into. The proposed change was unreasonable, he insists, because the required amount of excavation to be done by reason of the change was not bid upon by him, and the ground to be excavated was physically of a different character, more difficult and more costly to excavate. The trial court found that the completion of the dam on the angle of 44 degrees was the most economical, practical, and efficient method of completing the structure, and was a reasonable alteration of the contract plan. The evidence amply establishes the fact that it was more feasible, cheaper, and better to build the dam on the angle rather than on the straight line, and was a reasonable alteration of the original plans and specifications. It will be recalled in this connection that it was the appellant who first advocated that the work be completed on the angle of 44 degrees, in order to avoid the slide caused by the flood.

The whole course of dealing between the parties tends to destroy the contention of appellant. One of the noticeable features throughout the contract is the evident intention of the parties to vary the plan of construction of the dam if it be found beneficial or necessary. The essential feature of the contract was the construction of the dam. It is obvious that in a work of the nature and magnitude of the proposed construction, the highest engineering skill, even when exercised with utmost care, could not learn in advance all the physical conditions to be met with during the progress of the work. Those to whom the undertaking was intrusted, even with the aid of expert engineers, could not be expected to know in advance all along the line of operations what Nature had placed beneath the surface of the earth in the form of obstacles to construction. Alterations and changes, many slight and some substantial, would almost inevitably be required at certain points in a work of such nature. Prudence on the part of those in charge would compel them to make provision for such contingencies as could not be foreseen with ordinary care and prudence. This was the object of the clause inserted in the contract, which should be so construed as to effect its important purpose. The various alterations ordered by the respondent and carried out by the appellant without objection, and the final change ordered to be made from a straight line axis to the angle of 44 degrees, were all in conformity with changing conditions. If reasonable, they were clearly within the scope and object of the contract and the plan. Kinser Const. Co. v. State, 204 N. Y. 381, 394, 97 N. E. 871; Kingsley v. City of Brooklyn, 78 N. Y. 200; Daly v. Busk Tunnel Ry. Co., 129 Fed. 513, 64 C. C. A. 87; Phila., Wilmington & B. R. R. Co. v. Howard, 54 U. S. (13 How.) 307, 341, 14 L. Ed. 157.

In order to furnish contractors with bases for their bids for building the dam, it was necessary to assume certain quantities and lines. Appellant offered to do the work called for within these lines for a definite amount. For additional work within these lines, which the drawings on their face showed might be necessary, but the full extent of which could not be determined until the work progressed, he was to be paid at the unit prices fixed in the contract. But if the work fell outside the lines of the plans, he was to be paid cost, plus 12½ per cent. for profit, excluding overhead expense, for such extra work. The contract itself thus making specific provision "for additional depth of excavation beyond that specified," and "for additional concrete work over the dam as specified," and "for reasonable alterations, omissions, additions or substitutions," tends further to support the view that the parties had the conditions which subsequently arose in their minds at the time of entering into the agreement. The practical interpretation of the parties placed upon the contract also shows clearly that the different changes in the axis of the dam were regarded by them as alterations under the terms of the contract. Soon after the work was commenced it became apparent that it would be more economical and advantageous to complete the remaining portion of the dam on an angle rather than on a straight line axis. On May 25, 1920, and again on October 28 of the same year, during construction, as previously noted, orders were given to the appellant, and acted on by him, to change the axis of the dam to an angle with its original position. These changes were made and carried out under the contract. Appellant accepted these orders and never questioned the respondent's right to make such material alterations in the plan of work. After the flood of November, 1920, the respondent directed the appellant to return to the straight line axis of June 7, 1920, which direction the appellant accepted, and proceeded with the work. The evidence also indicates that it was the understanding of the appellant at the time the contract was entered into that the axis of the dam might be moved. At the very inception of the work, he built the trestle work from which the concrete was poured into the foundation in such position that, if a change was made in the location of the axis of the dam, it would not interfere with such temporary construction.

[3, 4] By this cross-complaint the appellant sought to recover from respondent the difference between the contract price for the work and cost to him plus 10 per cent. The question whether or not the change from a straight line axis to an angle of 44 degrees was unreasonable and so radically material as to terminate the contract for the construction of the dam, and give appellant a right to recover in quantum meruit for the value of the work done, was one of fact. Tribble v. Yakima Valley Transp. Co., 100 Wash. 589, 595, 171 Pac. 544; Annapolis, etc., Co. v. Ross, 68 Md. 310, 319, 11 Atl. 820. The trial court has not only construed the contract as a matter of law contrary to appellant's contention, but has also found, with ample support in the evidence, that the change ordered was a reasonable alteration under its terms. Appellant was not absolved from his contract by the natural obstacles intervening, unless they rendered performance practically impossible. Mere difficulty, or unusual or unexpected expense, would not excuse him. Carlson v. Sheehan, 157 Cal. 692, 697, 109 Pac. 29. Respondent was willing at all times, and, so for as we are able to judge from the record, able, to pay for all work measured by the terms of the contract. The order to quit work on the straight line axis and proceed on the angle of 44 degrees was not an order to quit work on the dam.

[5, 6] For another reason, appellant is not in position to question the order of May 21, 1921. The record is uncontradicted that he not only suggested the change from the straight line axis to an angle of 44 degrees, which was adopted by the respondent, but agreed to and accepted the order given him to complete the structure in that way. Appellant began exploratory work for the purpose of locating the foundations for the dam within the new lines. The answer to his contention that no written instruction was received by him is that he agreed to wait for the order in writing from the respondent to do the work until the Railroad Commission should give its consent for the location of the work within the new lines. Later, when asked if he would proceed provided the written order was given, he said he would not continue work under the contract at all. The law does not require an idle act. Civ. Code, § 3532. The provision in the contract that the respondent should direct alterations and substitutions in the work only by written order was for the benefit of the contractor and could be waived by him. Enterprise Hotel Co. v. Book, 48 Or. 58, 64, 85 Pac. 333; Cowles v. U. S. Fid. & Guar. Co., 32 Wash. 120, 126, 72 Pac. 1032, 98 Am. St. Rep. 838. The finding that the appellant accepted and acted upon the verbal order to cease to perform further work in and about the construction of the dam on the straight line axis, and to complete the work on the angle of approximately 44 degrees, was expressly requested by appellant, and was made by the court at his instance. He is now estopped from challenging a finding made at his request. Nat. Loan & Inv. Co. v. Rockland Co., 94 Fed. 335, 336, 36 C. C. A. 370.

[7] We deem it unnecessary to go into a consideration of the question suggested by the appellant that the grammatical construction placed by the respondent upon the clauses of the contract relating to payment would have ruined the contractor, and the counter suggestion of the respondent that the appellant would have benefited by the construction of the dam on the 44-degree angle, and would have received a substantial profit. As the trial court found, upon sufficient testimony, that the alteration of the plans was reasonable, we need not enter upon a discussion of the exact measure of compensation which might have governed had other conditions been found to exist.

[8] Appellant contends that when the respondent served notice of election on June 30, 1921, whereby it elected to take over the equipment of appellant, and followed that notice by commencing this action and obtaining an injunction restraining appellant from continuing the work, which, he alleges, he was then doing under the contract, it was the respondent and not appellant that broke the agreement between the parties. He argues that there was never any threat on his part to quit the work, except a conditional threat which he asserts is meaningless in law, and which he also maintains he had a right to make, for it involved a mere proposition of compromise on his part. These considerations derive importance, he asserts, because of the fact that he did not abandon his contract but remained at work, and that therefore respondent's election to take over the equipment and the institution of the suit for a restraining order were a breach by respondent of a still valid and existing contract. We are not impressed with appellant's argument on this point. It would have more convincing weight if he had not so readily contented himself with the situation at the time. He made no effort on the hearing of the order to show cause to show that the restraining order had been improvidently granted, or to resist the granting of the temporary injunction which only went to the length of preventing him from removing his equipment and supplies from the dam and from interfering with respondent in taking over and using the same. He stipulated that it be granted. The reason he did so is quite apparent. He himself had declared the contract "dead." His contention was that any further work would have to be done as under a new contract. He had notified his foreman to take steps to shut down the work. The force of men he maintained at the dam was seemingly small for properly carrying on the work, if he intended in good faith to proceed. The officers of the respondent company were out of the state. For that reason appellant had agreed, so he represented, to keep his outfit at the dam. He was possibly hoping for a favorable consideration of his proposals upon their return. These proposals were for payment for the work on a basis different from that provided in the contract, and respondent was not required to consider them. Appellant had declined to proceed under the contract. His refusal was to continue the work on the angle of the dam under the contract. The trial court has found that such work was a reasonable alteration or substitution provided for and included in the contract. Appellant had accepted the order to do such work, and his definite and oft-reiterated declarations that he considered the contract terminated can only be regarded, as amounting to a clear, unequivocal, and absolute refusal to perform. Woodman v. Blue Grass Land Co., 125 Wis. 489, 493, 103 N. W. 236, 104 N. W. 920, 921.

The clause of the contract giving respondent authority to take over appellant's equipment and to proceed to complete the dam provides that—

> "If the contractor fails to diligently prosecute said work in every particular, or if he shall abandon the work, or any part thereof, or shall fail in any way to perform the conditions of this agreement on his part to be performed, or shall become insolvent, or make an assignment or commit an act of bankruptcy, the company shall have the right, if it so elect, to take over all tools, equipment and supplies of the contractor * * * and proceed to complete the work."

There was ample authority in this provision for the respondent to proceed as it did. The appellant constantly claimed that the contract was terminated on May 21 because the order given him to complete the dam on the angle was unreasonable in that it called for work for which he claimed he would not be properly compensated, and that therefore the contract was terminated on that date. Having gone thus far, appellant is not in position to advance the inconsistent claim that the contract was in force at the time of the issuance of the restraining order, and that performance on his part was prevented by the respondent, and not by any act of his.

The trial court found that on June 23 and continuously thereafter the appellant was insolvent. The respondent contends that it was an implied term of the contract that appellant would not permit himself, through insolvency, to be disabled from performing his contract, citing Trustee in Bankruptcy v. Chicago Auditorium Ass'n, 240 U. S. 581, 36 Sup. Ct. 412, 60 L. Ed. 811, L. R. A. 1917B, 580. For this reason, it argues, it was justified in taking over the equipment. Whether this be so or not, or whether the insolvency of appellant prevented his completing the contract, it is unnecessary to decide. What we have already said disposes of the meritorious issues raised by the appeal.

MAROVICH v. CENTRAL CALIFORNIA TRACTION CO. (Sac. 3207.)

1. Carriers 🔑318(3)—Evidence insufficient to sustain allegations of unsafe tracks.

Where photographs in evidence fail to disclose any unevenness, irregularity, or other defects in street railway tracks, and there was no evidence of any swaying, jolting, or unusual movement of the car from which the existence of such defects might be inferred, the allegation of maintaining the track in an uneven and unsafe condition was not sustained.

2. Carriers 🔑318(3)—Evidence held not to show failure to equip car with rear-view mirror negligence.

Evidence held insufficient to show that the failure to equip a street car with a rear-view mirror was a negligent omission under Civ. Code, § 2100, requiring that carriers must use the best precautions in known practical use, but not requiring them to adopt every possible preventive suggested by the highest scientific skill, and not requiring speculative and untried experiments.

3. Carriers 🔑321(8)—Instruction on failure to equip car with rear-view mirror erroneous.

An instruction submitting to the jury the question whether the failure to equip a street car with a rear-view mirror was negligence, and whether such negligence contributed to the injury of a passenger who fell from the moving car, was erroneous, where the evidence was insufficient to show either that the omission to install such equipment was negligence or that it contributed to plaintiff's injury.

4. Appeal and error 🔑882(11) — Right to question sufficiency of evidence to support finding held not waived.

The arguing of a question of fact to the jury does not operate to estop a litigant from urging on appeal that the evidence was insufficient to support a finding on that issue, nor does a request by a defendant, sued for personal injuries, for an instruction that before recovery can be had "negligence as charged in the complaint" must be established, operate in effect as a consent and stipulation to the submission of a particular issue, so that the party would be bound by the finding thereon, though unsupported by the evidence.

5. Carriers 🔑318(5)—Evidence held not to show negligence in leaving street car gates open.

Evidence that the front entrance and exit gate of a one-man street car was not intended to be opened and closed on the entry or exit of each passenger held insufficient to warrant the submission to the jury of the question whether it was negligent for the motorman to leave such gate open, or that the failure to close such gate was a proximate or contributing cause to the injury of a passenger who fell from the moving car.

6. Negligence 🔑62(1) — Omission must be shown to be efficient cause; "proximate cause."

It is not enough to prove "proximate cause" to show that the injury would not have resulted in the absence of particular negligent omission, but plaintiff must show that the negligent omission was an efficient cause from which the injury naturally followed in continuous sequence, unbroken by any efficient intervening cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Proximate Cause.]

7. Evidence 🔑586(2) — Affirmative finding cannot be predicated on disbelief of negative evidence.

The fact that a jury may disbelieve the testimony of a witness who testifies as to the negative of an issue does not of itself furnish any evidence in support of the affirmative of that issue, and does not warrant a finding in the affirmative thereof, unless there is other evidence in the case to support such affirmative.

8. Carriers 🔑318(9)—Allegation that motorman negligently propelled car rapidly past stopping place, to injury of plaintiff's intestate, held unsustained.

In an action against a street car company for the death of plaintiff's intestate, who was shown to have stepped from the car while it was traveling rapidly at a point at which she had intended to alight, held, that an allegation that the motorman negligently propelled the car past her requested stop at a dangerous speed was not sustained by a showing that the rate of speed was the usual and customary one for that vicinity; there being no showing that the car slowed down so as to invite decedent to alight.

9. Carriers 🔑321(21)—Instruction requiring defendant to exculpate itself from all negligence conceivably applicable to the case held error where only specific acts of negligence charged.

In an action for death of plaintiff's intestate, where specific acts of negligence were alleged, an instruction that, if the jury believed decedent was killed while riding as a passenger on defendant's street car, defendant was called upon to show either that death was occasioned by inevitable casualty or was due to contributory negligence, held erroneous as requiring defendant to exculpate itself, not only from the negligent acts and omissions charged, but also from all others conceivably applicable to the case.

10. Negligence 🔑138(3)—Instruction applying doctrine of res ipsa loquitur should not be given where plaintiff makes no general charge of negligence.

Where plaintiff in his complaint makes no general allegation of negligence or no allegation of general negligence, instructions applying the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur should not be given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by Mike Marovich, as administrator of the estate of Katherine Marovich, deceased, against the Central California Traction Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Butler & Van Dyke, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Downey & Downey and G. A. Work, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

MYERS, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action for damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate by reason of falling or being thrown from a street car of the defendant while riding thereon as a passenger. The grounds urged upon the appeal are that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the implied finding that the defendant was negligent; that it is insufficient to sustain the implied finding that decedent was free from contributory negligence; and that the court erred in its instructions to the jury. The specifications of negligence in the complaint are five in number: (1) That the defendant's track was uneven and unsafe; (2) that the defendant's car was not equipped with a rear-view mirror in front of the motorman; (3) that the exit of the car was not guarded by a door or gate; (4) that the motorman negligently failed to stop the car at Q street after having been requested to do so; (5) that he negligently propelled the car past Q street at a dangerous rate of speed. The theory of plaintiff appears to have been that decedent had requested the motorman to stop at Q street, to which he had assented; that she thereupon took a position near the exit preparatory to alighting; that he negligently failed to stop the car; and that she fell or was thrown to the ground by the motion of the car.

The car was a small street car of a type in common use, having a central inclosed section with open platforms at the front and rear. Upon the front platform there were three seats on the left side and one upon the right side, with a central aisle between them; each seat being for two passengers facing forward. The only opening for the ingress and egress of passengers was a doorway at the front end of the right side of the car, to the right of the motorman. There were two steps below the level of the platform leading up to this doorway. It was equipped with a gate which could be closed, but in practice never was closed, and was not intended to be closed, except during the times when the car was being operated in the opposite direction, at which times this gate was kept closed and a corresponding doorway at the opposite end of the car was kept open. The car was operated as a one-man car.

The accident occurred at about 8:23 p. m. of September 25, 1919, while the car was proceeding along K street, in the city of Sacramento, a paved street in the residence district. It was after dark, but the car was lighted and the street lights were burning. Decedent had boarded the car and taken a seat in the inclosed section, intending to alight at Q street. She had made the same trip and alighted at the same place frequently. While the car was stopped at the intersection of T street, three blocks before reaching Q street, she went to the front platform and spoke to the motorman, mentioning either the words "Q street" or "U street," to which he made some response. He testifies that she asked him about U street, and that he told her it was one block back, but in support of the verdict we must assume that she asked him to stop at Q street and that he assented thereto. She then took a position near the front door of the closed section and remained there until after the car had passed Q street, and when it was about 100 feet beyond Q street she stepped quickly to the exit way and, without pausing or hesitating, stepped off the car and fell to the ground, striking her head violently upon the pavement and fracturing her skull. The car at the time was running full speed, about 15 or 18 miles per hour, which was the customary speed on that line when no stops were about to be made, and it had not slackened its speed at or near the intersection of Q street. The car was equipped with electric push buttons, at intervals of 30 inches along the sides of both the closed and open sections, for the purpose of signaling to the motorman. But the decedent, subsequent to the conversation at T street, gave him no signal or intimation of any kind of her intention to alight.

The witnesses vary slightly in their descriptions of the manner in which she left the car. Miss Button, a witness for the plaintiff, was seated in the front open section. She testified:

> "She walked to the door; she took hold of the—with her right hand—she put her foot down like this; she went right out straight into the dark; looked to me as though she turned a somersault; I don't know; she put her foot down just like this; she went out. * * * I saw her put her foot down; she took hold of the door; she went right out in the air. * * * Held on the right-hand side of the car, then just stepped off in the air, the way she did. * * * I don't know whether her foot reached the step; I saw her foot go down; instead of stopping she went on."

Reims, the motorman, called as a witness for plaintiff, testified:

> "She just walked off through the door and down on the steps. * * * She walked right out. * * * She was walking very fast."

Mr. Reynolds, a witness for defendant who was seated within the closed section, testified:

> "As I was sitting inside she stepped about like this (showing)—she fell over—I saw her start off; next I saw her when I looked out the window; she was on the street.
> "Q. You saw her walk up to the door? A. And start forward, start forward—I could not say.
> "Q. Just how did she start forward, you mean—how did she start forward? A. She walked up—there is—I don't know—the door, of course, she put her hand against this—That is up to the door— Just right in front of the steps, then just stepped right forward.
> "Q. Could you see from where you were whether she stepped down? A. I could not see whether she stepped down on the steps, the way the door was placed on the outside—I could not see until I saw her on the street—I saw her start forward; I thought, I knew, she was going to fall. I looked out of the window and saw her on the street."

The witness Tanner, called for defendant, was seated with his wife on the front open section. He testified:

> "Q. Then what happened? What did the woman do immediately leading up to the accident? A. Started to walk right out of the car; took hold of that iron, that bar—stepped right off the car. * * *
> "Q. After she got to the edge of the platform leading down to the steps, describe her movements. What happened? A. She stepped right in the air; she was off the car then.

"Q. Did you see her take hold of anything with her hand? A. I saw her right hand was taking hold of the iron that is there for that purpose, and walk right off in the air."

Mrs. Tanner, also called for the defendant, testified:

"Q. When she started, after you crossed Q street, when she started forward, describe her movements. A. She just walked forward; walked off the car. * * *

"Q. When she stepped off the platform—did she hesitate before she stepped off? A. No.

"Q. What did she do? A. No, she walked right off the platform. * * *

"Q. Do you know whether as she stepped off the edge of the car she reached the top step? A. I do not think so. Looked to me she walked right off the top of the platform."

The foregoing comprise all of the witnesses who testified to the happening of the accident. The witnesses all agree that subsequent to the conversation at T street the decedent gave no signal or other intimation to the motorman of her intention to alight; that the car was proceeding at full speed, which they estimated at 15 to 18 miles per hour; that decedent did not stop or pause or hesitate when she reached the exit of the car; and that there was no slowing of the speed of the car until after she had left it. The motorman testified that when he first saw her she was in the act of stepping down onto the first step; that he immediately threw off the power and applied the brakes; but that decedent proceeded rapidly down the steps and onto the pavement, and that the brakes did not take hold so as to check the speed of the car until after decedent was on the pavement.

[1] We will now consider the several allegations of negligence with a view to determining the claimed insufficiency of the evidence to sustain them. There is no evidence to support the allegation that the track was uneven and unsafe. Respondent calls our attention in this connection to the fact that four photographs were introduced showing the track in the vicinity of the accident. These photographs do not disclose the existence of any unevenness, irregularity, or other defect. So far as is disclosed by their examination, the track appears to have been in excellent condition and constructed in accordance with the accepted method of constructing street railway tracks in paved streets. Furthermore, there was no evidence that there was at any time any swaying, jolting, or other unusual movement of the car from which the existence of such defect might be inferred.

[2] It was shown in the evidence that the car was not equipped with a rear-view mirror. But there was no evidence to support the conclusion that the omission of such a mirror was a negligent omission. Not only was there an entire absence of direct evidence upon this point in the form of expert testimony, but there was also an entire absence of indirect evidence showing that such appliances had been or were in practical use at any time or place. Respondent relies upon section 2100 of the Civil Code, which provides that "a carrier of persons for reward must use the utmost care and diligence for their safe carriage, must provide everything necessary for that purpose, and must exercise to that end a reasonable degree of skill," and upon the statement in Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 574, 22 Pac. 266, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175, to the effect that "they are bound to keep pace with science, art and modern improvements in supplying safe vehicles, and must adopt the most improved modes of construction and machinery and appliances of safety in known use"; they are "bound to use the best precautions in known practical use to secure the safety of their passengers, but not every possible preventive which the highest scientific skill might have suggested"; they are "bound to have such vehicles and machinery * * * as the improvements known to practical men and tested by practical use may suggest, but not to take every possible precaution which the highest scientific skill might suggest, nor to adopt any mere speculative and untried experiment."

[3] The mere statement of the rule points to the insufficiency of the evidence herein. It was not shown that such appliance was known to practical men or that it had ever been tested by practical use, and the most that could be said under the evidence is that to adopt it would be a mere speculative and untried experiment. Even if it could be said that the omission of such a mirror was a negligent omission, it is difficult to conceive that it could have been a proximate cause of the injury to the decedent. A proximate cause is an efficient cause, and we are unable to perceive any chain of causation between the omission of the mirror and the injury to decedent. Puckhaber v. Southern Pacific Co., 132 Cal. 363, 64 Pac. 480. The trial court instructed the jury:

"If you believe that the street car * * * was not equipped with a mirror ahead of the motorman, and if you further believe that the failure to so equip this car on the part of the defendant was negligence, and that this negligence directly contributed to the death of Katherine Marovich, without fault on her part, your verdict will be in favor of the plaintiff."

Under the circumstances of the case it is not only possible, but highly probable, that the verdict of the jury was founded upon this erroneous conception of negligence, from which it follows that the judgment must be reversed, unless it can be said that this error was waived by appellant, or that it is estopped to complain thereof. O'Meara v. Swortfiguer (Cal. Sup.) 214 Pac. 975.

[4] It is suggested that appellant argued this issue to the jury, and thus in effect consented that the jury should pass upon it, but it has never been held, so far as we are advised, that the circumstance that a party has argued a question of fact to the jury debars him from urging upon appeal that the evidence was insufficient to support a finding upon that issue. Appellant might properly have requested the trial court to instruct the jury that the evidence was insufficient to support a finding in favor of plaintiff upon this issue. It did not do so, but requested, and the court gave, the following instruction:

> "The court instructs the jury that to entitle the plaintiff to recover in this action it must appear from the evidence that the injuries sustained by the decedent were occasioned by the carelessness or negligence on the part of defendant or its servants or employees as charged in the complaint." (Italics ours.)

It is argued that by requesting this instruction appellant, in effect, consented and stipulated to the submission of this issue to the jury and should therefore be bound by the jury's finding thereon. There is no merit in this contention. The requesting and giving of this instruction were in no sense equivalent to a stipulation or a declaration that the jurors might make a finding of negligence in the absence of evidence to support the same. It cannot be said that the appellant waived this point by failing to object to proof of the fact that the car was not equipped with such mirror. Plaintiff was entitled to prove this circumstance as a part of the res gestæ and in support of his allegation. He might have followed up this proof by evidence tending to show that such omission was a negligent omission, but he did not do so.

[5] The proof shows that the exit was provided with a gate which could be closed, but it appears from the testimony of the motorman and from an inspection of a photograph of the car, which is in evidence, that it was not such a gate as is intended to be opened and closed each time a passenger enters or leaves the car. The question of negligence in this behalf therefore is not, was the motorman negligent in not having the gate closed at this particular time? but was the company negligent in not having equipped its car with a gate which was to be opened for the entrance and exit of passengers and kept closed at all other times? If the car had been provided with such a gate, it would be a natural and reasonable inference that it was the duty of the motorman to close it, and the question of his negligence in failing to do so would be properly submissible to the jury. The real question of negligence in this behalf relates to the failure of the defendant company to equip its car with such a gate, and the evidence is as barren of any proof which would support a finding that such failure was negligent as it is with respect to the omission of the mirror. Counsel for respondent suggests that the court may take judicial notice of the fact that there are thousands of street cars in operation which are equipped with such gates. If this be true, the court must at the same time take notice of the fact that there are other thousands of cars in operation which are not so equipped, and the question whether the omission of such equipment is negligence should not be submitted to the jury upon the basis of pure conjecture or speculation, wholly unguided by evidence.

[6, 7] In support of the fourth allegation of negligence it must be said that the evidence was sufficient to support a finding that the motorman negligently failed to stop the car at Q street after having been requested so to do. But, again, there is an entire absence of a sequential relationship of cause and effect between this negligent omission and the injury. It is true that if the car had been equipped with a gate at this exit and the gate had been closed the accident would not have happened. But it is not enough to prove proximate cause to show that the injury would not have resulted in the absence of the negligent omission. Plaintiff must go further and show that the negligent omission was an efficient cause from which the injury followed in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any efficient intervening cause. In the instant case it is clear that the proximate cause of the injury was the act of the decedent in walking off the car while it was in motion. With respect to the absence of the gate, her act in so doing was an efficient intervening cause. It is the theory of respondent that she was induced, by her reliance upon the motorman's promise to stop at Q street, to take a position of danger near the exit, preparatory to alighting from the car; that the motorman, seeing her there, was reminded of his omission to stop; that he then suddenly and negligently applied his brakes; and that the sudden checking of the speed of the car caused her to fall. If this theory were supported by the evidence, it would serve to connect up each of the alleged specifications of negligence—the omission of a mirror, the omission of a gate, and the failure to stop—as proximate contributing causes of the injury. Appellant points out that this theory of the case is entirely outside of the issues as tendered by the complaint. But a more serious objection to it is that it is wholly unsupported by the evidence. There is no evidence of any reduction of speed until after decedent had left the car.

Respondent suggests that the jurors might have believed that portion of the motorman's testimony wherein he says that he applied his brakes as quickly as possible after seeing decedent upon the step of the car, and might have disbelieved that portion of his testimony wherein he says that the brakes did not take effect until after she was on the pavement. Conceding this, it still leaves the case barren of any evidence that they did so take effect. The fact that a jury may disbelieve the testimony of a witness who testifies to the negative of an issue does not of itself furnish any evidence in support of the affirmative of that issue, and does not warrant a finding in the affirmative thereof unless there is other evidence in the case to support such affirmative. A finding that the decedent, while standing near the exit, was thrown from the car by the sudden checking of the speed thereof, would be not only wholly unsupported by any affirmative evidence, but would be contrary to the evidence of several witnesses, including those of the plaintiff, who testified that the decedent did not stop or pause or hesitate at the doorway, but that, on the contrary, she walked right off the car.

[8] As to the fifth allegation, that the motorman negligently propelled the car past Q street at a dangerous rate of speed, it was shown without conflict that the rate of speed was the usual and customary one for that vicinity. There is no evidence that it was either negligent or dangerous. If the car had slowed down as it approached this intersection this might have been construed as an invitation to decedent to alight, and if she had attempted to alight under such circumstances the operation of the car might have been regarded as a proximate cause of her injury, but no sequential relationship is here discernible between the speed of the car and the injury to decedent.

[9] The court instructed the jury:

> "If you believe that Katherine Marovich was killed while riding as a passenger on the street car of the defendant by defendant's operation of any of its instrumentalities, then I instruct you that the defendant is called upon to show either that her death was occasioned by inevitable casualty which human foresight could not have prevented, or was due to contributory negligence on her part, and if you further believe that the defendant has not done this, your verdict should be for the plaintiff."

This instruction should not have been given under the issues as framed. The general rule is that—

> "Where the plaintiff in his complaint gives the explanation of the cause of the accident, that is to say where the plaintiff, instead of relying upon a general allegation of negligence, sets out specifically the negligent acts or omissions complained of, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply." Connor v. A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 207 Pac. 378, 22 A. L. R. 1462, and cases cited.

The foregoing statement of the rule in the cited case was followed by the qualification that—

> "Where the explanation leaves it doubtful as to whether or not the ultimate cause of the injury is the negligence of the party charged, it is proper to instruct the jury as to the res ipsa loquitur doctrine."

[10] Regardless of the effect of the foregoing qualification upon the general rule, it is clear that, where the plaintiff in his complaint makes no general allegation of negligence or no allegation of general negligence, instructions applying the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur should not be given. This must be so, for the reason that in such case the plaintiff can recover only upon proof of one or more of the specific acts or omissions alleged in his complaint. Jahant v. Central Pac. R. R. Co., 74 Cal. 9, 15 Pac. 362; Verdelli v. Grays Harbor, etc., Co., 115 Cal. 517, 528, 47 Pac. 364, 778; Rowe v. Such, 134 Cal. 573, 576, 577, 66 Pac. 862, 67 Pac. 760; Cary v. L. A. Ry. Co., 157 Cal. 599, 603, 108 Pac. 682, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 764, 21 Ann. Cas. 1329; Roberts v. Sierra Ry. Co., 14 Cal. App. 180, 192, 111 Pac. 519, 527; Foley v. Northern Cal. Power Co., 14 Cal. App. 401, 410, 112 Pac. 467; Johanson v. Brookings Commercial Co. [The Frank D. Stout] (C. C. A.) 276 Fed. 382, 385. It follows therefore that the defendant, in order to exculpate itself, is not required to do more than disprove the specific acts and omissions alleged. But the effect of the instruction as given was to cast upon the defendant the burden of exculpating itself, not only from the negligent acts and omissions charged in the complaint, but also from all others conceivably applicable to the case, and told the jury, in effect, that, if the defendant failed to do so, they should return a verdict for plaintiff, even though it were based upon some act or omission not alleged in the complaint.

As the judgment must be reversed for the reasons indicated, it is unnecessary to consider appellant's claim that the evidence is insufficient to support the implied finding that the decedent was free from contributory negligence.

Judgment reversed.

TANNAHILL v. SUPERIOR COURT OF ORANGE COUNTY et al. (L. A. 7646.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 6, 1923.)

Exceptions, bill of 🔑53(4)—Writ of mandate issued to compel settlement of bill, objection being insufficiency of evidence.

Where a judge of the superior court refused to settle a bill of exceptions because the evidence was insufficient to justify the finding, a writ of mandate will issue to compel such a settlement; the insufficiency of the evidence being the question sought to be reviewed.

In Bank.

Application by J. M. Tannahill for a writ of mandate to be directed to the Superior Court of Orange County and Judge Z. B. West. Writ granted.

See, also, 209 Pac. 77.

J. R. Jaffray, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. H. Winder, of Riverside, for respondents.

WILBUR, C. J. This is an application by the successors of J. M. Tannahill, deceased, who was plaintiff in the case of J. M. Tannahill v. F. S. Greening, for writ of mandate to compel the respondent to settle a bill of exceptions in that case. The respondent refused to settle the bill of exceptions upon the objection of the defendant and entered the following order:

> "It is further ordered that objection No. 6 set forth in the objections to said bill on behalf of the defendant F. S. Greening is hereby allowed."

Objection No. 6 was that the settlement of the proposed bill should be refused for the reason that it was impossible to ascertain therefrom how or in what respect the evidence is insufficient to justify finding No. 1 or finding No. 2 or any or either of said findings, in that it appears from the evidence quoted in said bill that the same was amply sufficient to justify each and both of said findings.

The trial court should not have considered the question of whether or not the evidence was sufficient to justify the findings at the time of the settlement of the bill of exceptions, as that question was to be submitted on the bill of exceptions. The bill was proposed and should have been settled in order to secure a review of that very question.

It may be true that the bill of exceptions as finally adopted would require an affirmance of the judgment, but that is not to be considered upon the application for a settlement of the bill.

Let the writ issue.

THOMAS et al. v. GISMEGIAN et al. (S. F. 10243.)

Agriculture 🔑11—Lien for changing surface of land to adapt it to irrigation properly allowed; "improvement."

The grading and leveling of land so as to change the surface so that it could be irrigated is in the nature of a permanent improvement for the purpose for which it was intended, namely, farming by irrigation, and lien therefor was properly allowed under Code Civ. Proc. § 1191, as amended by St. 1913, p. 333, which provides that one grading, filling, or otherwise improving the land is entitled to a lien on the premises for work done thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Improvement (Of Land).]

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action to foreclose mechanic's lien by R. G. Thomas and others against O. G. Gismegian and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Lindsay & Conley, of Fresno, for appellants.

G. L. Aynesworth and L. N. Barber, both of Fresno, for respondents.

WILBUR, C. J. The plaintiffs recovered judgment for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien for the grading of a tract of land belonging to the defendant. The plaintiffs' claim of lien was based upon the provisions of section 1191 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 333). Since the amendment the statute provides that—

> "Any person who, at the request of the owner of any lot or tract of land, grades, fills in, or otherwise improves the same, or the street, highway, or sidewalk in front of or adjoining the same, * * * has a lien upon said lot or tract of land for his work done and materials furnished. * * *"

The grading and leveling in this case was done to so change the surface of the ground that it could be irrigated, and was in its nature a permanent improvement of the land for the purposes for which it was intended, namely, farming by irrigation. Appellants contend that the case of Young v. Shriver (Cal. App.) 206 Pac. 99, is controlling, and that if that case is to stand as authority the judgment in this case must be reversed. The case of Young v. Shriver dealt with a claim that the first plowing of land, as distinguished from subsequent plowings of the same in the cultivation of crops, was an improvement within the meaning of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure. We have no doubt as to the correctness of that decision as applied to the plowing of lands for the purpose of preparing them for the sowing of seed or planting of crops.

In the case at bar, however, the leveling of the land was in the nature of a permanent improvement as distinguished from the plowing and leveling essential to the raising of annual crops. The statute gives a lien to one who grades or fills in land, and both were essential in this case and are covered by the express terms of the statute. In some sections of the state the initial expense of leveling land so that it can be irrigated constitutes a very large proportion of the permanent value of the land, and there would seem to be no good reason in such cases for declining to allow the person making such improvements a lien therefor in accordance with the express terms of the statute. We are satisfied that the plaintiffs were entitled to a lien upon the premises in question under the express terms of the statute.

Judgment affirmed.

PACIFIC ROLLING MILL CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 10768.)

Prohibition ⚿3(3)—Remedy for review of acts of Industrial Accident Commission is adequate.

Even if Const. art. 20, § 21, as amended November 5, 1918, so as to give the Legislature plenary power to create a complete system of workmen's compensation, and Workmen's Compensation Act, § 67, subds. (a) and (d), relating to writs of review, did not deprive the Supreme Court of jurisdiction under the Constitution to issue writs of prohibition to the Commission, the remedy provided by the Legislature and by the Constitution for the review of the decision of the Commission is plain, speedy, and adequate, so that prohibition will not issue to prevent the Commission from proceeding with a rehearing on an application for compensation.

In Bank.

Original application for writ of prohibition by the Pacific Rolling Mill Company and another against the Industrial Accident Commission and the Commissioners thereof, to prevent the Commission from rehearing an application for compensation. Writ denied.

Burbank & Spence, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for writ of prohibition to prevent the Industrial Accident Commission from proceeding with a rehearing in the matter of the application of Jean J. Ebbets. It is claimed that the Industrial Accident Commission has lost jurisdiction by reason of once having rendered a decision denying compensation. It is contended that this court has power under the Constitution to issue a writ of prohibition regardless of the provisions of section 67, subds. (a) and (d), Workmen's Compensation Act (Stats. 1917, p. 831). Subdivision (d) of section 67 provides as follows:

> "The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state relating to writs of review shall, so far as applicable and not in conflict with this act, apply to proceedings in the courts under the provisions of this section. No court of this state, except the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal to the extent herein specified, shall have jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct or annul any order, rule, regulation, decision or award of the Commission, or to suspend or delay the operation or execution thereof, or to restrain, enjoin or interfere with the Commission in the performance of its duties; provided, that a writ of mandamus shall lie from the Supreme Court or the District Courts of Appeal in all proper cases."

Assuming, without deciding, that this court has jurisdiction under the Constitution and under the Workmen's Compensation Act (section 67, subds. [a], [d], supra) to issue writs of prohibition against the Industrial Accident Commission, the Legislature has provided a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy for errors as to jurisdiction committed by the Industrial Accident Commission. Moreover, the Constitution was amended November 5, 1918 (article 20, § 21), so as to give the Legislature—

> "plenary power, unlimited by any provision of this Constitution, to create and enforce a complete system of workmen's compensation, by appropriate legislation. * * * A complete system of workmen's compensation includes * * * full provision for vesting power, authority and jurisdiction in an administrative body with all the requisite governmental functions to determine any dispute or matter arising under such legislation, to the end that the administration of such legislation shall accomplish substantial justice in all cases expeditiously, inexpensively, and without incumbrance of any character; all of which matters are expressly declared to be the social public policy of this state, binding upon all departments of the state government.
> "The Legislature is vested with plenary powers, to provide for the settlement of any disputes arising under such legislation by arbitration, or by * * * any, or all of these agencies, either separately or in combination, and may fix and control the method and manner of trial of any such dispute, the rules of evidence and the manner of review of decisions rendered by the tribunal or tribunals designated by > it; provided, that all decisions of any such tribunal shall be subject to review by the appellate courts of this state. * * * The creation and existence of which [Industrial Accident Commission] with all the functions vested in them, are hereby ratified and confirmed."

If this constitutional provision did not expressly authorize the Legislature to prohibit issuances of writs of prohibition directed to the Industrial Accident Commission by the courts of this state theretofore having power to issue such writs by reason of the jurisdiction vested in such courts by the Constitution itself, and if, as the petitioner contends, the Legislature has not attempted to prohibit interference with the Industrial Accident Commission by writs of prohibition, where they are acting without jurisdiction, nevertheless the remedy provided by the Legislature and by the Constitution for the review of the decisions of the Industrial Accident Commission is in this case a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, and for that reason the petition for writ of prohibition must be denied.

SHAINGOLD v. SHAINGOLD. (L. A. 6958.)

1. Divorce 🔑130—Finding of court on matters alleged in cross-complaint held sufficient to sustain judgment denying divorce.

In an action for separate maintenance, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint asking for divorce on the ground of cruelty, a finding of the court to the effect that it was not true that matters complained of had caused defendant grievous mental suffering and great mental anguish, and the additional finding in the judgment denying a divorce that "the evidence does not support the allegations of the complaint and the cross-complaint" held sufficient to support a judgment denying a divorce.

2. Trial 🔑393(1)—Findings contained in the judgment itself held sufficient.

Findings contained in the judgment itself are sufficient.

3. Divorce 🔑150(2)—Decree denying divorce is sufficiently supported by finding of mutual condonation though other findings may be insufficient.

A finding of the court that there has been a mutual condonation is sufficient to support a judgment denying a divorce though insufficient findings may have been made concerning other matters.

4. Divorce 🔑135—Testimony that matrimonial intercourse continued until filing of cross-complaint insufficient to support finding of condonation.

Under Civ. Code, § 118, providing that, as respects cruelty consisting of course of conduct, cohabitation or passive endurance shall not be evidence of condonation, testimony by both parties that there had been matrimonial intercourse until the filing of husband's cross-complaint is insufficient, standing alone, to support a finding of condonation of husband's cruelty.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Summerfield, Judge.

Action for separate maintenance by Rebecca Shaingold against Jack Shaingold, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint for divorce. From a judgment denying relief to either party, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Lewis and Guy Lewis, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Max Rapaport, of Sacramento, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. This is an action by a wife for separate maintenance, based upon allegations of cruelty and nonsupport. The husband filed a cross-complaint for divorce upon the ground of cruelty. The court denied both maintenance and divorce. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and respondent files no brief and makes no appearance in this court.

[1] Appellant's claim is that the court did not sufficiently find the facts as to his allegations of cruelty. The finding of the court was to the effect that it was not true that the matters complained of had caused the defendant grievous mental suffering or great mental anguish. Reference was made in the finding to the paragraph of the cross-complaint and its numerous sudivisions charging plaintiff with cruelty.

Appellant relies upon the cases of Smith v. Smith, 62 Cal. 466, and Franklin v. Franklin, 140 Cal. 607, 74 Pac. 155, as authority to the effect that the finding in question is not sufficient because it leaves to inference the question of whether or not the cruelty complained of actually occurred. It is not, however, necessary to consider this question, because additional findings are included in the judgment denying a divorce, as follows:

> "Now, therefore, said court, having duly considered the same, makes its findings of fact and decision as follows: The court finds that the evidence does not support the allegations of the complaint and the cross-complaint, therefore it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the said plaintiff is not entitled to a divorce from the defendant, and a decree of divorce is denied."

[2] Findings contained in the judgment itself are sufficient. Hopkins v. Warner, 109 Cal. 133, 41 Pac. 868; Hibernia Savings & Loan Society v. Clarke, 110 Cal. 32, 42 Pac. 425; Locke v. Klunker, 123 Cal. 231, 55 Pac. 993. This finding contained in the judgment, construed with the other findings in the case, is sufficient to support the judgment denying divorce.

[3, 4] There is another reason for affirming the judgment. The trial court found that there had been mutual condonation, and this finding is not attacked. We do not base our decision on this ground, however, although it is amply sufficient in the absence of an attack, because an examination of the record shows that this finding is based upon the testimony of both parties that matrimonial intercourse continued until the filing of the cross-complaint, and if this is the sole basis of the finding of condonation the evidence would not support the finding. Civ. Code, § 118.

Judgment affirmed.

SCOTT v. SYMONS et al. (Sac. 3170.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑880(1)—Sole appellant held to have no status to question judgment of accounting between copartners in sale of mining property.

In suit by the owner of a one-sixth interest in mining property for an accounting and to recover her interest in the escrow fund received from sale thereof, in which the steward of the fund and defendant as an alleged unauthorized payee of part of the fund were parties, defendant not being a party to the option agreement to sell the properties, nor to the agreement for disposition of the proceeds, as sole appellant from judgment declaring plaintiff's one-sixth interest in the proceeds after payment of authorized debts, cannot question correctness of the judgment on accounting between the copartners.

2. Appeal and error 🔑880(1)—Defendant as sole appellant excluded from urging objection to judgment against codefendant.

In a copartners' suit for accounting for funds received from the sale of mining property in which the steward of the fund and defendant as an unauthorized payee of part thereof were parties, defendant as sole appellee from judgment against the steward and himself for the amount paid by the steward to him cannot urge objections to judgment in so far as it affects the steward's individual liability.

3. Trusts 🔑95—Defendant accepting unauthorized payment from trust fund became an involuntary trustee.

Under Civ. Code, § 2243, providing that every one to whom property is transferred in violation of a trust holds it as an involuntary trustee unless purchasing in good faith and for value, where defendant knew that the steward of an escrow fund was authorized to make payment thereof only on claims against copartnership, and with knowledge of the character of the fund procured payment therefrom on claims against individual copartners and on claims not authorized by plaintiff to be paid therefrom, he became an involuntary trustee.

4. Trusts 🔑95—Good faith of party securing wrongful payment from trust fund held not to affect rights of owner.

In a copartners' suit for an accounting and to recover one-sixth of an escrow fund received from the sale of mining property in which the steward of the fund and an unauthorized payee therefrom were parties, notwithstanding there was no conspiracy between the steward, payee, and depositary to defraud plaintiff, having wrongfully come into possession of money from the fund, the fact that they acted in good faith cannot affect the rights of plaintiff, and payee became an involuntary trustee for plaintiff. Civ. Code, §§ 2223, 2224.

5. Limitation of actions 🔑39(11)—Wrongful payment of trust money governed by four years' statute.

For action based on a written contract creating a trust, which was violated by wrongful payment of moneys, contrary to the terms of the trust, the period of limitations is four years.

6. Limitation of actions 🔑201—Express finding as to statute of limitations not necessary where facts found show action not barred.

It is not necessary that the court find expressly as to the statute of limitations where the facts found show the action was not barred.

7. Judgment 🔑527—Judgment for plaintiff held to be finding of no unnecessary delay in bringing action.

A judgment for plaintiff in action for accounting and to recover her one-sixth interest in proceeds of sale of mining property was a finding against her alleged unnecessary delay in instituting action.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by Annie C. W. Scott against Thomas F. Symons and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

William M. Abbott and William M. Cannon, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Grant & Zimdars and William H. Bryan, both of San Francisco (Frank M. Angellotti, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

WASTE, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff for an accounting and to recover from the defendants various sums of money claimed to be due her by reason of the acts and conduct of the defendants in connection with the application and distribution of the proceeds of the sale of what was known as the Black Oak group of mines in Tuolumne county and in which plaintiff was the owner of an undivided one-sixth interest. The appeal is by the defendant Symons alone, under the alternative method, from a judgment rendered against him and the defendant J. B. Curtin, jointly, in favor of the plaintiff, for the sum of $15,016.33, which sum the trial court found was wrongfully diverted from the trust fund created by the deposit in bank of the proceeds of the sale of the mining property.

The mining property in question was acquired in 1890, and was thereafter owned by the following parties as tenants in common: W. P. Scott, this plaintiff's husband, hereinafter at times referred to as Proctor Scott, having an undivided one-sixth interest, W. G. Scott having an undivided one-sixth interest, C. S. Dowe holding an undivided one-third interest, and George W. Campbell and Olive R. Campbell, his wife, jointly holding the remaining undivided one-third interest. When the mines were acquired, these parties, excepting Olive R. Campbell, formed a partnership for the working of the mining property, which partnership was known by the firm name of Scott, Dowe & Co., and which continued to operate the mines until 1903, when Proctor Scott died, and his wife, the plaintiff and respondent herein, succeeded to his interest therein. No conveyance was ever made by the tenants in common, or any of them, to the partnership. At the time of the death of Proctor Scott the partnership was heavily in debt, including taxes chargeable against the mining property, in the sum of $69,408.83. At the time, as appears from the findings, no one of said copartners had overdrawn his accounts with the partnership, or was indebted to the partnership or to each other on account of partnership transactions, or otherwise, and the partnership was not indebted to any of the members composing it on account of partnership transactions. It also appears that none of the firm had advanced to the partnership any sum in excess of the original contributions made at the time of its formation. The court also found that prior to the death of W. P. Scott no accounting of the mine operations carried on by the partnership was ever had, and the relations of the partners to the business had never been adjusted. Continuously from the time of the death of Proctor Scott until the commencement of this action the most unfriendly relations existed between plaintiff and the associates of her deceased husband. Plaintiff desired a sale to be made of the mining property, and at all times objected to the working of the mines or the incurring of any indebtedness or obligation in connection therewith. Over these objections the surviving copartners continued, at a financial loss, to operate the property under the firm name until 1904, when Campbell, Dowe, and W. G. Scott formed a corporation, styled and known as the Black Oak Mining Company, no other person being connected with the corporation but those named. Campbell, Dowe, and W. G. Scott leased the mining property to the new corporation, and operations were thereafter carried on in the name of the company, which had separate books of account, and all of its transactions were conducted in the name of the corporation. The plaintiff refused to, and did not, have anything to do with the corporation, and refused to, and did not, join in the lease for the property to the company. She never participated in the affairs of the corporation. By the beginning of 1906, Campbell, Dowe, and W. G. Scott and the lessee corporation, Black Oak Mining Company, had exhausted their credit, and the mines were closed down.

Pursuant to a common desire, all the parties interested, the plaintiff included, on December 6, 1907, joined in the execution of an option or agreement to sell the mining property to S. A. Knapp for the sum of $202,500 net to the owners, payable within three years and four months from date of the agreement. At the time of entering into the contract, Knapp was aware, in a general way, that an unpaid indebtedness existed, having been contracted by Scott, Dowe & Co. in carrying on mining operations under the old partnership, prior to the death of W. P. Scott, and that a larger indebtedness had been incurred by the Black Oak Mining Company. He also knew there were certain liens against the property. The option agreement, therefore, provided that the owners, including this plaintiff, should cause to be executed and placed in escrow with the First National Bank of Sonora, a grant, bargain, and sale deed of the mining property, and should also (and this is a vital consideration in the case) "cause to be executed and placed in escrow, at the same time with said deed and conveyance, an agreement from all the creditors or persons holding outstanding claims of indebtedness against the parties of the first part (the owners of the mine), to the effect that none of said claims or indebtedness will be pressed for payment by any suits which may constitute a lien or institute other proceedings against any of the properties before mentioned, or in any wise interfere with the quiet use, possession, and working thereof by the party of the second part (S. A. Knapp) during the life of this agreement, and will, at the same time, place in escrow, with said deed and conveyance, proper satisfaction of mortgages and liens upon said property, the same to be delivered when the indebtedness evidenced and secured thereby shall have been paid out of the proceeds of the sale of said property to be hereinafter mentioned." The agreement further provided for partial payments on the purchase price of the mine, and that when the purchase price was fully paid the First National Bank of Sonora, as escrow agent, should deliver to Knapp deeds, transfers, and documents placed in escrow; and the bank was further authorized "out of the moneys thus received, as the purchase price of said mines, to apply the same in discharging the indebtedness of the parties of the first part in accordance to their priority of record, all taxes due being especially hereby agreed as the first in priority, and thereafter, mortgages and liens, as the same appear of record, and next thereafter all indebtedness not constituting a lien on said property as shall be given to said bank by the parties of the first part on agreements to be made by said creditors, and the balance then remaining shall be paid over to the parties of the first part in the proportions of one-third to G. W. Campbell and Olive R. Campbell, one-third to C. S. Dowe, one-sixth to W. G. Scott, and one-sixth to Annie C. W. Scott; and the said bank shall further cause to be recorded, the expense of which shall be paid by the parties of the first part, the said satisfaction of said liens, so that, at the time of the delivering of said deeds and conveyances to the party of the second part, all liens against said properties to be conveyed shall be satisfied of record." The option agreement also provided that Knapp should keep correct books of account of all moneys invested and expended in the operation of the mining property, and should render to the owners, "or to the agent of them as may be hereafter agreed upon," true and correct statements of the total receipts.

Almost coincident with, and as part of the same transaction, an agreement was made by W. G. Scott, George W. Campbell, and Olive R. Campbell, C. S. Dowe and Annie C. W. Scott, this plaintiff, and the Black Oak Mining Company, by its vice president and secretary, with the creditors of Scott, Dowe & Co. and of the Black Oak Mining Company, by the terms of which the creditors agreed not to enforce their demands pending the exercise of the option by Knapp, and that such creditors would look for payment of their demands to the First National Bank of Sonora. All of the debtors, including this plaintiff, agreed that the statute of limitations would be waived, and that the creditors should be paid by them, through said bank, out of the purchase price of the mining property in the event the option was exercised. On September 19, 1908, proper deed conveying the property to Knapp, together with copy of the option and the creditors' agreements entered into with the owners, were deposited with the First National Bank of Sonora in escrow, and the bank agreed in writing to accept and administer the trusts and make the payments provided for, and directed to be made, by the terms of the option agreement. Knapp took immediate possession of the property, and proceeded to work the mines. Thereafter, on the 13th day of October following, the owners of the property, other than Annie C. W. Scott, plaintiff and respondent, together with S. A. Knapp, in writing, pursuant to the terms of the option agreement, constituted the defendant J. B. Curtin agent of the owners "to carry out any and all things provided for in said agreement." Among other things provided for in such power of attorney, all claims were to be paid on his order by the escrow agent under the option agreement, and he had power to designate whether the funds in the hands of the bank should be kept in a special or regular deposit. He might change the escrow agent at any time.

Thereafter, on December 5, 1910, plaintiff and the surviving partners of Scott, Dowe & Co. granted the Black Oak Development Company, as assignee of Knapp, an extension of time. On April 3, 1913, three days prior to the expiration of this extension, the development company exercised its rights, and deposited with the First National Bank of Sonora $202,500, being the full amount of the purchase price of the mining property, and in addition thereto certain amounts of interest required by the extension. On that same date, as appears from the record, Annie C. W. Scott, this plaintiff and respondent, in writing, authorized and empowered the defendant J. B. Curtin "my agent for the purpose of the adjustment and payment of the claims of the creditors of the copartnership heretofore existing under the name of Scott, Dowe & Co., and for the purpose of the payment of the indebtedness of said Scott, Dowe & Co. * * * to sign checks and draw upon the moneys now in the hands of the First National Bank of Sonora, California, paid thereto by Black Oak Development Company on account of the purchase price of the Black Oak Mining properties; and I further authorize and empower said J. B. Curtin to sign and draw checks upon the said funds now in the said bank for the purpose of the payment of the indebtedness of the Black Oak Mining Company, a corporation, but this authorization is given with and under the express understanding and consideration that my one-sixth interest in the moneys now in said bank shall not be liable for any indebtedness of or claims paid to the creditors of the said Black Oak Mining Company." Defendant Curtin, as agent of the owners, began paying the claims asserted against the escrow fund. He continued until he had paid out about $168,000. Of this amount, the trial court found that $69,408.83 was properly payable on the debts of Scott, Dowe & Co. incurred before the death of plaintiff's husband, with interest thereon up to April 3, 1913, and the amount of taxes chargeable against the mining property to that date. Curtin also paid to the defendant Symons $18,611.14, of which $3,594.81 was for unsecured demands representing debts and liabilities contracted by the Black Oak Mining Company, and included in the creditors' claims required by the option agreement, and two smaller claims, held by Symons under assignment, and all of which he purchased for about 30 cents on the dollar. Included in the above sum paid by Curtin to Symons was an item of $13,926.13, paid to him as assignee in satisfaction of a judgment rendered in favor of the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company on a claim and demand against W. G. Scott and C. S. Dowe, as individuals, two of the former owners of the mining properties, for that amount. This judgment was not a claim or demand against either the Black Oak Mining Company or Scott, Dowe & Co., but was a claim against Scott and Dowe individually, and was not a lien on the mining properties, and was not included in the creditors' agreements. Another item of the aggregate amount paid by Curtin to Symons was a claim of the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, on a note signed by W. G. Scott, C. S. Dowe, G. W. Campbell, and the Black Oak Mining Company, for $831.30, with interest amounting to the sum of $195.75, which was not included in the creditors' agreement. The total amount of these demands purchased by Symons from the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company was the sum of $14,953.73, for which he paid $5,000. Curtin also paid him $62.60 for two claims not on the creditors' list, making his total trespass on the fund equal $15,016.33.

Before the death of W. P. Scott, plaintiff's husband, a mortgage on all of the mining property was executed by said W. P. Scott, W. G. Scott, C. S. Dowe, G. W. Campbell, and Olive R. Campbell to Thomas A. Fisher for the sum of $10,048.50. After the death of W. P. Scott, G. W. Campbell and Olive R. Campbell executed a mortgage on their undivided one-third interest in the property to Fisher for $3,296.70. Thereafter W. G. Scott, C. S. Dowe, G. W. Campbell, and Olive R. Campbell executed two mortgages to Fisher of their individual undivided five-sixths interest in the mine, one for $5,000 and one for $24,800. All of these mortgages bore exorbitant rates of interest. Because of this fact, and for the reason that the mortgages, with the exception of that joined in by W. P. Scott, were mortgages of the individual interests of the mortgagors, defendant Curtin declined to make disbursements from the escrow fund in full payment of the mortgage debts, but made a tender and a deposit of the sum of $54,755.14 in full satisfaction. This tender appears to have been made under an agreement between Fisher and Curtin, whereby the former agreed to accept a flat rate of 7 per cent. interest.

Including this last tender and deposit in satisfaction of the Fisher mortgages, Curtin had now paid out about $168,000 of the escrow funds. There remained subject to his order on special deposit the sum of $38,843.08, which amount the trial court found he considered at that time to be in excess of the equity and claim of the plaintiff, Annie C. W. Scott, in the fund derived from the sale of the mines.

Fisher subsequently repudiated the agreement for a settlement, and brought suit to foreclose the mortgages held against the mining properties. The owners of the mine, the First National Bank of Sonora, and the Black Oak Development Company were made defendants in the actions. He recovered judgment for the sum of $76,644.20. Fisher was one of the signers of the creditors' agreement. The option agreement and the agreement between the owners and the creditors were before the court in the foreclosure actions by proper pleadings. The trial court found that the lien of the mortgages had been transferred from the mining property to the escrow fund, and that Fisher was obligated to look to the bank for the payment of his money, and that the purchaser of the property who had paid the purchase price into the bank was entitled to obtain title to the property free and clear of any liens arising by reason of the mortgages. Backed by this judgment and an order of court, over the express written instructions of Curtin, the bank paid over the entire balance of the escrow fund to Fisher. By this payment the fund was completely exhausted.

Plaintiff brought this action upon the theory that she was entitled to one-sixth of the amount remaining in the escrow fund after the payment by Curtin of the antecedent debts of Scott, Dowe & Co., including interest and taxes, and that the payment or adjustment of any other claims and demands against the fund by Curtin was unauthorized. In this connection the trial court found that by the terms of the written authorization executed by plaintiff to Curtin, taken in conjunction with the provision of the option agreement, the agreement between the owners of the mining property and the creditors, and by other writings which appear in the record, plaintiff "authorized said J. B. Curtin to pay the creditors of Scott, Dowe & Co. and the creditors of the Black Oak Mining Co. who had signed the creditors' agreement out of the purchase price fund, resorting, if necessary, to her (plaintiff's) share of the fund for that purpose," but that "her interest in said purchase price fund, as the successor in interest of her husband, W. P. Scott, * * * was not liable for the debts contracted by the Black Oak Mining Company, or by W. G. Scott, C. S. Dowe, George W. Campbell, or Olive R. Campbell after the death of W. P. Scott. * * * That the said power of attorney of April 3, 1913, was given to Curtin by plaintiff upon the understanding and conditions recited in the said writing that plaintiff was not liable for the debts of the Black Oak Mining Company and all persons justifying or claiming under said power of attorney are estopped from asserting that said plaintiff was liable for payment of Black Oak Mining Company debts, or that plaintiff's share of the fund resulting from said sale can be charged with the payment of said debts." The trial court also found that plaintiff did not, by the terms of the power of attorney, or otherwise, authorize the payment by Curtin of any indebtedness that was not included in the creditors' list, and that her authorization did not empower Curtin to pay the individual indebtedness of any of the other owners of the property. Nor was Curtin, nor the bank authorized to pay any unsecured debt which was not a lien against the mining property, unless the creditor who was the owner of said indebtedness had signed the creditors' agreement. The court also found that, after the signing of the power of attorney and prior to the payments by Curtin of any moneys to Symons, as assignee of certain demands, plaintiff notified Curtin that her authorization did not authorize or empower him to pay any moneys whatever out of the escrow fund excepting in payment of the debts of Scott, Dowe & Co., whereby the payments would diminish the amount of moneys remaining in the bank to such a sum that, after subtracting the debts of Scott, Dowe & Co. owing at the time of the death of W. P. Scott, there would not be left sufficient money to give to plaintiff the undivided one-sixth of the full purchase price of said mining property.

The trial court found that the full amount of all taxes against the mining property owing or unpaid on April 3, 1913, including interest, penalties, and costs, and the full amount of all obligations of every kind owing by the partnership of Scott, Dowe & Co. at the time of the death of W. P. Scott, with interest to April 3, 1913, was the sum of $69,408.83. It deducted that amount from $207,091.85 (being the sum of $202,500 plus $4,591.85, interest due and payable under the terms of the extension contract with Knapp), the result of which subtraction is $137,683.02. It found that of this amount plaintiff was entitled to receive an undivided one-sixth, or the sum of $22,947.17, on the 3d day of April, 1913, when the mine was fully paid for. The court then "finds that W. G. Scott, George W. Campbell, Olive R. Campbell, and C. S. Dowe were entitled to the remaining five-sixths of the said purchase price and interest so paid to said bank; and the court finds that said five-sixths, to which the said W. G. Scott, George W. Campbell, Olive R. Campbell, and C. S. Dowe were entitled, has been received by them by being paid out by their consent and approval in discharge of the debts and obligations of the Black Oak Mining Company, for which debts the said W. G. Scott, George W. Campbell, and C. S. Dowe were liable, and to the payment of which Olive R. Campbell consented, or the same was paid in discharge of the individual indebtedness of W. G. Scott, George W. Campbell, Olive R. Campbell, or C. S. Dowe, or to some of them individually, or was paid otherwise with their approval and consent, and no part of the full sum paid into said bank on account of said purchase price and interest was left in said bank at the time of the commencement of this action, and that no part of said purchase price was paid to this plaintiff."

The trial court also found that the defendant Curtin made certain unauthorized payments from the trust fund. In the foregoing facts the trial court concluded, and by its decree declared, that plaintiff, as the successor in interest of W. P. Scott, her deceased husband, to a one-sixth share of the mining property, was entitled to receive, on April 3, 1913, and was the owner of, $22,947.17 out of the purchase price of the property. It was further decreed that plaintiff have and recover from defendants Symons and Curtin the sum of $22,324.65, said amount being the sum of $15,016.33, paid by Curtin to Symons for demands which were not on the creditors' agreement and which were not a proper disbursement under the terms of either the option or the creditors' agreement, with interest thereon from May 8, 1913, the date on which the unauthorized payment was made. Judgment was also decreed in plaintiff's favor against the defendant Curtin for two several amounts aggregating $9,149.52, with interest, by reason of the alleged unauthorized payments by Curtin out of the trust fund.

[1] Appellant takes the position that the action was not tried as one for an accounting between the co-owners of the mine, but, in fact, as one to compel defendant Curtin to give an accounting of his stewardship. As sole appellant from the judgment "in favor of Annie C. W. Scott, the plaintiff in said action, and against said Thomas F. Symons," he cannot question the correctness of the judgment of the lower court settling the accounts between plaintiff and her co-owners. The prayer of the complaint was that an accounting be had and taken of all the dealings and transactions of the partnership, Scott, Dowe & Co., from the time of its organization, and of the moneys received and paid out and accounted for in the operation and working of the mines and mining property of such partnership, and that an accounting be had between plaintiff "and the other defendants herein." All the parties to that controversy were before the trial court, and the court has determined as between them that plaintiff was entitled to an undivided one-sixth of the amount realized from the sale of the property after deducting therefrom only that portion of the fund which was applicable to the payment of taxes on the property and the debts of the partnership, Scott, Dowe & Co., contracted before the death of plaintiff's husband. Appellant says that on the trial the taking of an account was waived. The record affords some support to appellant's contention, but the fact remains that the action did embrace the claim for an accounting of the funds arising from the proceeds of the sale of the mining property. As to that fund, it was definitely and finally decided that between the various persons interested in the fund, of whom appellant Symons is not one, this plaintiff was entitled to the whole of the balance. Defendant Curtin, who was the disbursing agent of all the parties in the transaction, and who paid out the various claims against the escrow fund, rendered an account of his transactions. The trial court found that no one of the partners had overdrawn his accounts with the partnership, or was indebted to the partnership or to each other on account of partnership transactions, or otherwise, and that the partnership was not indebted to any of the members composing it on account of partnership transactions. It also found that none of the firm had advanced to the partnership any sum in excess of the original contributions made at the time of its formation. From these and the other findings to the effect that plaintiff was entitled to an undivided one-sixth interest in all of the escrow fund remaining after payment of claims strictly arising out of the partnership of Scott, Dowe & Co., and that the other members of the partnership and owners of the mining property were entitled to the remaining five-sixths of the purchase price and interest paid the bank, and had received their proportion through its being paid out by Curtin with their consent and approval in discharge of the debts and obligations of the Black Oak Mining Company, for which debts they were liable, we may readily conclude that the court did, in effect, take an accounting between all the parties to the option. It does not matter that there may not have been in the strictest sense an accounting, as appellant contends. The lower court, to all intents and purposes, found that plaintiff was entitled to an accounting, and upon that accounting adjudged the amount owing to plaintiff from her associates to the option agreement. Her associates, all of whom were parties to the action, have not appealed from the judgment declaring that she was entitled to such an accounting, and fixing the sum of money payable to her. Appellant was not a party to the option agreement, nor, as to the unlawful payments made by Curtin to him, was he a beneficiary under its terms or by the creditors' agreements. He had no lien of any kind against the interests of any of the parties to the instruments or to the fund, either by way of assignment, execution, attachment, or otherwise. Neither was the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, under which he claimed, a party to the option agreement or to the creditors' agreements, nor was it privy legally to any party holding claims under those agreements. He occupied simply the position of an open, unsecured, individual creditor of two of the parties to the option. That the claim advanced by Mrs. Scott and sustained by the trial court may be opposed to documentary evidence, or that there may be findings in the record, based upon the reservation contained in the power of attorney executed by Mrs. Scott, which are contrary to the evidence, is no concern of this appellant. He has no status to question the correctness of the judgment on the accounting between the parties interested in the sale of the mining property.

fund which were contained in the creditors' agreement. There is much in the record indicating that Symons had full knowledge and notice of the contents of the option agreement, and he certainly must have had a thorough understanding of the terms of the creditors' agreement which he himself signed. Prior to the payment of any money by Curtin to Symons, as assignee of his various demands, plaintiff, through her attorney, notified Curtin in writing that the authorization of April 3, 1913, contained in the so-called power of attorney, did not give him authority or empower him to pay any moneys whatever out of the fund except in payment of the debts of Scott, Dowe & Co.

[4] The trial court found no conspiracy was entered into by the defendants Symons, Curtin, or the First National Bank, or any of them, for the purpose of defrauding plaintiff, either in the matter of the purchase of creditors' claims at a discount by Symons, or in the payment of any of such claims out of the moneys resulting from the sale of the mining properties. Even though such finding may have the effect, as appellant contends, of establishing that Curtin and he acted in good faith, still, if money in the trust fund was wrongfully disbursed, the fact that they acted in good faith in the wrongful disposition cannot affect the rights of the true owner. Having wrongfully come into possession of money belonging to the trust fund, whether it was by mistake, violation of the trust, or otherwise, Symons became an involuntary trustee of the amount thereby gained for the benefit of plaintiff, who, the court found, would otherwise have had it. Civ. Code, §§ 2223, 2224; Heydenfeldt v. Jacobs, 107 Cal. 373, 377, 40 Pac. 492. Neither do we doubt in the least that he had full knowledge of the character of the fund in the hands of the bank, and exact notice of the instruments declaring the purpose to which such fund could be lawfully applied and paid out by Curtin. Appellant gave no consideration of value or otherwise to this plaintiff for the money paid him by Curtin from the trust fund. He bought for an amount far less than their face value the judgments of the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company against W. Guy Scott and C. S. Dowe, individually. Plaintiff derived no benefit from the satisfaction of the judgments against Scott and Dowe which appellant gave to Curtin in return for the unlawful payment from the trust fund.

The trial court found that there was no accord or satisfaction of any claims or demands between plaintiff and Symons; that there was no understanding or accounting of any kind between them concerning any matter whatsoever; and there was no agreement on the part of plaintiff that there was any sum of money due to Symons from the fund derived from the sale of the mining property.

What we have already said disposes in effect of appellant's contention that the judgment must be reversed, even if respondent's other positions are sound, because he is obliged to account to her only to the extent of one-sixth of the fund remaining after the payment of the debts properly chargeable against it. Appellant overlooks the two-fold nature of this action. One purpose was for an accounting of the affairs of the copartnership of Scott, Dowe & Co., and a determination of the rights of the plaintiff and her co-owners of the mining properties in connection with the purchase-money fund. Under this phase of the case, the court has determined, and its judgment in that respect is final, that the plaintiff alone is entitled to a certain definite amount, to wit, $22,947.17, and that the other parties who were interested in the fund have been paid, and their claims against it discharged, through the disbursements made by Curtin. The other purpose of the action is to have the defendants, including appellant, account for and return to the fund any moneys unlawfully taken from it by them. Under the evidence and findings, Symons trespassed against the fund and became an involuntary trustee to the extent of his unlawful acquisition. Respondent seeks in this action, so far as appellant is concerned, to recover judgment against him for the amount that respondent, as the sole beneficiary of what should have remained in the trust fund, was entitled to have, and to force him to make good that which she lost through his action, with simple interest thereon during the time of its unlawful detention. Civ. Code, §§ 2238, 2262.

[5, 6] Other considerations urged by the appellant in support of his appeal may be more briefly disposed of. The court did not expressly find upon the issue of the statute of limitations. The action is based upon a written contract whereby a trust was created, which was violated by the wrongful payment of moneys contrary to the terms of the trust. The period of limitations for such action is four years. McArthur v. Blaisdell, 159 Cal. 604, 608, 115 Pac. 52; Code Civ. Proc. § 343. The findings do say, however, that the wrongful payment to Symons was made on May 8, 1913. The original complaint was filed April 1, 1916. The action was commenced within three years after the wrongful diversion of the fund. It was not necessary that the court find expressly as to the statute of limitations where the facts found show the action was not barred. Woodham v. Cline, 130 Cal. 497, 499, 62 Pac. 822.

The contention of appellant that the judgment must be reversed because the trial court did not find upon the issue of ratification is disposed of by the finding of the trial court that there was no understanding or accounting nor accord or satisfaction of claims and demands between plaintiff and Symons, and by pertinent facts elsewhere in the findings which negative any idea that plaintiff ratified, approved, or confirmed the acts of the defendant Curtin, done or performed in her behalf, to the extent of approving his dealings with appellant.

[7] The contention that the judgment must be reversed because plaintiff's claim is barred by her laches, and because the trial court failed to find upon that issue, is disposed of by the fact that the court, having given judgment in favor of plaintiff, in effect, found against unnecessary delay on her part in instituting the action. Stevinson v. San Joaquin, etc., Co., 162 Cal. 141, 144, 121 Pac. 398. The evidence fully sustains the trial court in this regard.

The judgment is affirmed.

WESTERN INDEMNITY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (L. A. 7521.)

Master and servant ⚷419—Change of compensation from permanent disability payment to temporary disability payment authorized.

The power of the Industrial Accident Commission, under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, §§ 9(8), 20(d), to allow a temporary disability payment in lieu of a permanent disability payment for a single injury is a power which, from the nature of the object to be accomplished, must be a continuing power and within the scope of the continuing jurisdiction for which provision is made by the act, and such change does not violate section 17(c), providing that there shall be but one cause of action for each transaction.

Application for writ of review by the Western Indemnity Company to annul an award by the Industrial Accident Commission of California for compensation for injury to Leo Vane. Award affirmed.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. This is an application for the annulment of an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission of this state under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831).

Respondent Leo Vane, employed as an auto truck driver by the Floribel Farm & Cattle Company, a corporation, was injured June 15, 1918, in the course of his employment and while engaged in an attempt to set in motion the engine of said auto truck by rotating the starting crank. The engine "backfired," suddenly setting in motion the starting crank, which struck his right arm with great force, fracturing the radius of the right (major) forearm. The employer, Floribel Farm & Cattle Company, carried a policy of insurance with the Western Indemnity Company, petitioner herein. Shortly after said injury was inflicted, respondent was taken to the city of Los Angeles and placed in the care of a physician, appointed by petitioner, for treatment. Two operations were performed by said physician, including bone grafting, but neither operation seemed to have resulted satisfactorily. The fractured bone refused to unite. This caused a deformity of the injured member and affected the free use of the wrist, thumb, and fingers. It also resulted in the shortening of the injured arm to the extent of one inch and a fraction more. During the last stages of treatment, which extended over a period of about four years, upon the request of respondent, a change of physicians was granted by the Commission. Two other operations were subsequently performed by a physician skilled in the treatment of fractured bones. As a result of these operations the fractured bones became solidly united and the impaired condition of the hand and wrist were greatly restored.

The record shows that respondent filed, on February 7, 1921, with the Industrial Accident Commission an application for the adjustment of his claim. It is stated therein that a permanent disability rating of 30.3 per cent. had theretofore been made. This rating entitled respondent to receive as compensation a weekly payment of $16.67 per week for a period of 123 weeks, totaling $2,060.41. The payment of this sum, together with payments in full for medical care and attendance was acknowledged. The primary purpose of respondent seems to have been to obtain from the Commission an order for another operation to relieve him from the ill effects of the injury. The statement of facts in support of the application is, in part:

> "That a permanent disability rating of 30.3 per cent. or 123 weeks at $16.67 was given applicant for one inch shortening of right (major) radius, limited motion of thumb and wrist; partial loss of grasping power and deformity. The rating has been paid out. It is now claimed that there is nonunion of the radius, remedial by operative treatment."

This application was resisted on the ground that respondent had been paid in full for a permanent disability rating of 123 weeks, and that full medical, surgical, and hospital treatment had been furnished:

that two operations had been performed, including a bone graft, and that it was the opinion of the operating surgeons that it would be of no benefit to respondent to operate on his arm further; that, so far as the fracture was concerned, his arm was in an apparently satisfactory condition.

On May 17, 1921, the Commission found that the injury had resulted in a permanent disability, the extent of which could not then be determined. It further found that there existed an ununited fracture of the right radius with deformity at the wrist, producing restricted motion of the wrist and hand, and that an operation would probably reduce the same as outlined by the reports of physicians in the case. The operation was ordered and accordingly performed at the expense of petitioner. The employer was released from liability thereon.

On May 22, 1922, the application of respondent requesting that a rating of permanent disability be made and that the findings and award theretofore made be amended accordingly was granted without opposition. The Commission found that the injury had caused a permanent disability equal to 30.75 per cent. of total disability, amounting to $2,040.50, which sum had been paid, and it ordered that "applicant take nothing further by reason of his injury forming the basis of this proceeding." On the following day, to wit, May 23, 1922, respondent petitioned for a rehearing. This petition was based on the ground that the evidence did not support the findings and that respondent had discovered new evidence which he could not with reasonable diligence have discovered and produced at the hearing. It was also urged as a ground for rehearing that he "had no notice of the amount of the permanent disability rating which was to be given him and had no opportunity of showing to the Commission what the period of temporary disability was." He also claimed that he was unable to do any work from the day he received the injury, to wit, June 15, 1918, to the day the petition was filed, to wit, May 22, 1922. The injury with its resultant effects following surgical operations performed at various times in an effort to unite the fractured radius and severed tendons during the period of disability are described and declared to have rendered respondent totally unable to perform any kind of work. The prayer of the petition was that the period of temporary disability be definitely determined and that the award be based on temporary disability instead of permanent disability for the reason that an award based on the first ground would exceed the award made for permanent disability. The petition for a rehearing was granted on the ground that the evidence did not justify the findings as to the character of disability sustained, inasmuch as a temporary disability payment would exceed the award made for permanent disability. After contest had, the Commission filed its decision October 13, 1922, by which it was found that the injury inflicted upon the respondent caused a temporary total disability extending from the day of injury to and including May 22, 1922, and that said injury also resulted in a permanent partial disability as set out in the amended findings. It further found that the period of payment for said temporary total disability and the amount of compensation due therefor exceeded the period of payment and the amount of compensation for permanent partial disability, and that respondent was entitled to the greater payment. Said findings and award of May 22, 1922, were amended by adding thereto a finding that the injury caused temporary total disability dating from the date of injury to and including May 22, 1922, entitling respondent to a weekly payment of $16.67 for a period of $203^6/_7$ weeks, amounting to the sum of $3,398.30, of which sum $2,050.41 had been received by respondent. In other words, respondent was awarded the sum of $1,347.89 as unpaid compensation for temporary disability suffered in addition to the amount found to have been received by him as compensation for said injury by the findings and award filed May 17, 1921. The moneys previously paid were treated as a credit on account of temporary disability payments.

By the application filed February 7, 1921, the only relief sought was an order for a surgical operation. It was specifically so stated in the following language:

> "Question: Whether operation should be resorted to to relieve from the effects of the injury, a permanent disability rating having been made and paid out?"

Prior to the filing of said application the permanent disability rating department of the Commission made on November 30, 1920, the following entry of record:

> "Digest: One inch shortening of the radius of major forearm; limited motion of thumb and wrist; partial loss of grasping power and deformity, 30.75 per cent., 123 weeks at $16.67 per week."

This order seems to furnish the original ground or basis for the claim that a finding of permanent disability had been made. It was carried into both the petition requesting further operative treatment and the order granting said treatment, which contains a statement or recital that the injury had resulted in permanent disability the extent of which could not then, to wit, May 17, 1921, be determined, but that probably the injury would be materially decreased by surgical operation.

Respondent's condition seems to have baffled medical skill. Eminent surgeons disagreed as to whether he would be improved by another operation. There is but little of definiteness expressed in the testimony or reports of experts with respect to the extent of the injury. It seems quite certain that whatever use respondent was able to make of the injured member prior to the operations performed pursuant to the order of May 17, 1921, was totally lost, temporarily, at least, as the result of said operations, which, however, in the end proved to have been wisely performed. He was sufficiently restored thereby in body to resume farm labor on May 24, 1922. As before stated, there was a decided difference of opinion shared by the medical profession, both as to the treatment that should be administered and as the prognosis of the case. Two delicate operations of bone grafting had been performed. A supposedly united fracture had upon two occasions become loosened. Severed nerves and tendons caused new trouble. Under such circumstances it was practically impossible in the earlier stages of the injury for the Commission to determine with any degree of definiteness the extent or permanency of the disability.

The objections of petitioner have their origin entirely in the amendments to the award and findings made and entered May 22, 1922. By that amendment the disability payments were changed from permanent to temporary disability payments. It is the contention of petitioner that the character of disability was unalterably fixed and determined by the order or findings made May 17, 1921, and, no rehearing having been requested or ordered, the matter had long since become final. The purpose and scope of the last-mentioned order has already been adverted to. The findings and award of May 22, 1922, which were subsequently amended over the objection and opposition of petitioner, were not objected to or opposed at any time before proposal or at the time of their adoption or since. It is the amendment thereto that is challenged. But do not the facts of the case present more than a mere question of the right of the Commission to amend its orders, findings, and awards as these matters ordinarily arise? Section 9(8) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act provides as follows:

> "Where an injury causes both temporary and permanent disability, the injured employee shall not be entitled to both a temporary and permanent disability payment, but only to the greater of the two."

Under the state of the case as shown by the record and the law as written did the Commission have the authority to change the award from a permanent disability payment to a temporary disability payment? Petitioner contends that it had no such right. If this contention be sound, the section last above cited would in many cases be rendered inoperative, and the right of an injured employee to avail himself of its benefits would be dependent upon the ability of the Commission to foretell the result of an injury from the beginning and in advance of all possible future developments. The present case illustrates the injustice that might be done should an interpretation be given to the act which would hold an injured workman to a rating which thereafter is proved to have been prematurely and erroneously made. The award here complained of was made within the limits of the statutory period, to wit, 245 weeks from the date of the injury, and we are of the opinion that the case falls within the provisions of the act by which the Commission is granted continuing jurisdiction over all its orders, decisions, and awards. After an opportunity to be heard has been had and good cause appearing therefor, the Commission may rescind, alter, or amend any order, decision, or award made by it. The right is reserved to it to review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase, or terminate, within the prescribed limits of the act, any compensation awarded, upon the ground that the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has recurred, increased, diminished, or terminated. Any order, decision, or award rescinding, altering, or amending a prior order, decision, or award can have the same effect as is provided for original orders, decisions, or awards. (See section 20(d) of said act.)

We are persuaded that the power of the Commission to allow a temporary disability payment in lieu of a permanent disability payment is a power, which, from the nature of the object to be accomplished, must be a continuing power and within the scope of continuing jurisdiction for which provision is made by the act. Otherwise the act, in part at least, would be self-destructive.

But aside from what has been said on the subject of continuing jurisdiction it is by no means certain that the act requires a formal application to be made on the part of an injured employee to entitle him to a change from one kind of disability classification to another if such change is for his benefit. The act seems to indicate that it is the duty of the Commission to make such a change whenever the facts before it clearly disclose that a change would be beneficial to the employee. The language of the statute is that the employee, when the injury causes both a temporary and a permanent disability, "shall not be entitled to both a temporary and permanent disability payment but only to the greater of the two." (Italics ours.) Thus it is seen that the larger amount is awarded by force of the statute itself. There is no denial of the fact that the temporary disability payments exceed the permanent disability payments. The weekly amounts in each instance are the same; the advantage of a temporary disability payment being accounted for by the greater period over which it extends.

No question of the violation of the provisions of paragraph (c) of section 17 of the act under consideration, which provides that there shall be but one cause of action for each transaction coming within the provisions of the act, and that certain claims may be joined in the same proceedings, is here involved as contended for by petitioner. There was but one injury suffered and but one action brought to recover compensation therefor. There is no room to urge laches against respondent. The rules announced in the cited cases (Ehrhart v. Industrial Accident Commission, 172 Cal. 621, 158 Pac. 193, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 465; Georgia Casualty Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 177 Cal. 289, 170 Pac. 625) are not in conflict with any principle of law announced here. In the instant case no claim is made that respondent suffered two distinct injuries, one of which was not mentioned or investigated until after the statutory time had run against it, but for which compensation nevertheless was allowed; neither do the facts and method of procedure, as shown in the case last above cited, wherein the Commission, after the denial of a petition for rehearing, annulled the original award and made an award not predicated upon any new facts occurring since the original award was made, but which was based solely upon a reconsideration of the facts upon which the former award was made, present a case analogous to the one at bar.

If the order made May 17, 1918, is in legal effect a finding and award, as claimed by respondent, then beyond question sufficient new facts have arisen in this case but which were absent in Georgia Casualty Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra, to sustain the final award made October 13, 1922. If, on the other hand, said order of May 17, 1918, did not amount to an award, the Commission was not concluded by it, and the final award was authorized.

The cases cited to sustain petitioner are totally different in material respects from the facts constituting the instant case, and the provisions of law relied upon to sustain those cases are not repugnant to the conclusion we have reached in the case at bar.

The award is affirmed.

Ex parte OKAHARA. (Cr. 2473.)

1. Aliens 🔑6(1)—Contract for working lands held not a lease giving interest in land contrary to land law.

A contract designated one of employment by which the employer was to furnish the land which the other party, called the contractor, a Japanese citizen, was to work and prepare for cultivation, plant designated fruit trees and fruits, the crops of which he was to gather and deliver as designated by the employer, who was to pay the contractor percentage of the net proceeds, the contractor to have access to land at all times and employer to have control of the contractor and employees with privilege of terminating the contract, held not a lease of land or an agreement of a nature to transfer or convey any interest in the land to the contractor contrary to Alien Land Law, §§ 2, 10.

2. Tenancy in common 🔑1 — May exist in crops without existing in the land.

Tenancy in common may exist in crops without existing in the land.

3. Aliens 🔑6(1)—Statute forbidding aliens to "acquire," "possess," "enjoy," or "transfer" land construed, and terms defined.

As used in the Alien Land Law, Nov. 2, 1920, Stat. 1921, xxxiii, the words "acquire, possess, enjoy and transfer," used in an inhibitory sense, are well understood legal terms. "Acquire" as used in the law of contracts and descents means to become the owner of property; to make one's own. "Possess," used in reference to land titles and estates, means to own; have as a belonging; property; in popular usage the word "possess" includes real and personal property to which one has title as his landed possessions." The word "enjoy" is one frequently found in instruments of transfer and means to make such use of the thing transferred as is consistent with the tenure by which it is held. "Transfer" is a word commonly used to denote a passing of title in property (usually realty) or an interest therein from one to another, the purpose of the law being to prevent ownership and legal interest in farming lands from passing to aliens who could never become citizens (citing Words and Phrases, First Series, Acquire; Possess).

Application by K. Okahara for habeas corpus to the Sheriff of Placer County to secure petitioner's release from custody on charge of conspiracy to violate the Alien Land Law. Petitioner discharged.

Thomas & Sullivan, of San Francisco, and Raglan Tuttle, of Auburn, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Frank English, Deputy Atty. Gen., and C. C. Coolidge, Dist. Atty., of San Jose, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. Petitioner, K. Okahara, a person of the Japanese race and a native born subject of the Empire of Japan, and being ineligible to citizenship in this country, is restrained of his liberty by the sheriff of Placer county, this state, upon a warrant issued on a complaint charging him with conspiring with one Tom Vicencio to unlawfully and feloniously effect a transfer of an interest in real property in violation of section 10 of the Alien Land Law, approved November 2, 1920, by the people of this state as an initiative measure (Stats. 1921, lxxxiii). By this proceeding he asks to be released from custody on the theory that he has committed no public offense.

The gravamen of the offense charged is that on March 20, 1922, petitioner, in furtherance of an unlawful conspiracy, executed an agreement and contract with said Vicencio whereby said Vicencio transferred to petitioner for a term of five years an interest in a certain parcel of agricultural land containing 20 acres, situate in the county of Placer. The portions of the act which bear directly on the case are sections 2 and 10 which provide as follows:

> "Sec. 2. All aliens other than those mentioned in section 1 of this act (aliens eligible to citizenship) may acquire, possess, enjoy and transfer real property, or any interest therein, in this state, in the manner, and to the extent, and for the purpose prescribed by any treaty now existing between the government of the United States and the nation or country of which such alien is a citizen or subject, and not otherwise. * * *"
> "Sec. 10. If two or more persons conspire to effect a transfer of real property, or of an interest therein, in violation of the provisions hereof, they are punishable by imprisonment in the county jail or state penitentiary, not exceeding two years, or by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or both."

The acquisition or ownership of agricultural lands or an interest therein is not one of the rights guaranteed to or conferred on alien Japanese by any treaty relations existing between the Empire of Japan and this country.

The facts relied upon to sustain the charge of conspiracy are those which constitute the substance of the covenants of the parties to the contract and therefore appear upon the face of the instrument, the material portions of which follow:

Vicencio, the party of the first part, who is himself but a tenant of the real property in controversy, is called by the instrument the employer, and Okahara, the party of the second part, is called the contractor. Said contractor agrees to clear all of said 20 acres of land and make it ready for plowing and planting within a period of two years from the date of the execution of said agreement, one-half of said land to be cleared during the first year of the agreement and the remaining half during the second year at the price of $50 an acre. The contractor is to plant the whole of said property to orchard within two years from the date of said agreement, all trees to be furnished by the employer. The contractor agrees to plant between the rows of fruit trees 5 acres of the land to raspberries, 5 acres to blackberries, 5 acres to strawberries, and 5 acres to tomatoes, cantaloupes, and other garden truck. The agreement provides that the party of the second part is an independent contractor and he is required to adopt the most approved customs of the neighborhood in the care, raising, and cultivation of fruit trees, vines, and such vegetables as shall be grown on said property. He also agrees to gather, pick, and pack all merchantable fruits, berries, and vegetables at seasonable times and make delivery thereof at any fruit house designated by the employer. The contractor further agrees to furnish all and every kind of labor and all and every kind of machinery, tools, and equipment necessary for the performance of the terms of said agreement. Such tools and implements as are on said premises may be used by the contractor in the performance of the contract and are to be returned at the expiration thereof in as good condition as when received, wear and tear excepted. The products from the soil are to be sold by the employer on such terms and conditions as he may deem best, and the contractor is to receive as his compensation (in addition to the allowance hereinbefore mentioned of $50 per acre for clearing said land) 50 per cent. of the net proceeds derived from the sale of said products. The contractor's share of the net proceeds shall be paid to him in cash by the employer within 30 days after receipt thereof. Certain deductions are to be made from the net proceeds and allowed the employer, such as for shook, hay, straw, or other materials furnished by him to the contractor, and all costs, charges, commissions, and expenses paid or incurred by said employer on account of the products or the marketing thereof, including all costs, charges, and expenses paid or incurred by the employer in the cultivation of said land and orchard other than work done by the contractor, as well as all sums of money advanced by the employer to the contractor, and all indebtedness due or payable to the employer by the contractor.

Paragraphs 6 and 7 of said agreement contain the terms and covenants by which the legal status of the agreement must be fixed and follow in the language of the contract:

> "6. It is understood and agreed that the contractor shall have access to the land hereinbefore described at all convenient times for the purpose of doing the work aforesaid. All crops of every nature and character to be grown on said land shall belong to and be the property of the employer and the contractor shall have no interest, right, or claim in or to any part of the said crops but his sole right shall be to the compensation paid by the employer as herein provided and the said compensation shall be in full payment for all services of said contractor for outlays and expenses paid or incurred by the contractor in or about said work.

"7. The employer shall have no control over the said contractor and his employees and equipment, but the contractor agrees that he and all persons employed by him shall be sufficient and diligent in the prosecution of said work, all of which shall be done in good and workmanlike manner and according to the best husbandry and methods of doing said work. It is further understood and agreed that if at any time the employer is dissatisfied with the work done by the contractor or with the progress of such work he may immediately terminate this contract on paying to the contractor compensation up to the time of such termination, as follows: Upon ten days' written notice given by employer to contractor, said compensation to be the usual wages paid for similar work in the same neighborhood.

"Neither this agreement nor any interest therein shall be assignable or transferable by the contractor, either voluntarily or involuntarily, without the consent of the employer, in writing first had and obtained."

The validity of section 10 of the Alien Land Law is not open to question, as this court recently in a proceeding in which its validity was assailed, pronounced it valid. In re Y. Akado, known as S. Ikada, 207 Pac. 245. It is there said:

> "It is well settled that, in the absence of a treaty to the contrary, a state may forbid the taking or holding of property within its limits by aliens. (Blythe v. Hinckley, 127 Cal. 436, 59 Pac. 787.) Our Constitution leaves to the Legislature this power with regard to all aliens ineligible to citizenship. (Article I, § 17.) The provisions of the act in terms allow such aliens to take and hold agricultural land to the extent that such taking or holding is prescribed by any treaty with the country of which such alien is a subject. The treaty with Japan does not prescribe or secure to its citizens the right to take or hold agricultural land situated in this state. Hence the act does not violate the treaty in that respect."

See, also, cases cited in Blythe v. Hinckley, 127 Cal. 436, 59 Pac. 787; O'Brien v. Webb (D. C.) 279 Fed. 117; Porterfield v. Webb (D. C.) 279 Fed. 114; Terrace v. Thompson (D. C.) 274 Fed. 841.

[1] The only question before us therefore is whether the acts, purposes, and objects as shown upon the face of the instrument are, in fact, such acts, agreements, purposes, and objects as are forbidden by subdivision 10 of the Alien Land Law. If by a reasonable construction of the agreement the case is fairly brought within the inhibition of the law the petitioner should be remanded, otherwise he must be discharged.

It is the law of this and most of the states of our Union that contracts of the character of the one before us do not transfer or convey any interest in real property. Neither do they constitute agreements to do so. At a very early period in our judicial history and at a time before the ownership of lands by aliens not eligible to citizenship had excited public interest, this court in Bernal v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 542, 79 Am. Dec. 147 (decided in 1861), Field, C. J., writing the opinion, held that an agreement in relation to the use and cultivation of land between the parties whereby the owner was to furnish the seed, teams and sacks, and the other party was to do the work and give the owner for the use of the land one-third of the grain raised, although designated by the parties a lease, was not one, but a contract for the working of a farm upon shares. Bernal v. Hovious, supra. That case, a leading one, is based on the rule declared in Caswell v. Districh, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 379, and Putman v. Wise, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 235, and runs through the decisions of this state.

Unquestionably, much care was taken in the selection of the words and phrases by the parties to the agreement with a view to avoid a violation of the law under which the charge is laid. But few of the formal words and phrases ordinarily found in freehold or leasehold instruments appear in the agreement. It is true, as suggested by counsel for the state, that the character of an instrument depends upon the intention of the parties as disclosed by the language used to express the intention of the parties and not by any particular name given it by them. But it is also true that we are not permitted to make the instrument before us the basis for a criminal action even though we may be able to concur in the suggestion that it was artfully and adroitly drawn for the purpose of avoiding a conflict with a penal statute of the state. The question is: Does it show upon its face a violation of the law as written? In form and in substance this contract follows closely a contract considered and upheld by the United States District Court, Northern District of California, in the case of O'Brien v. Webb, supra, and we entertain no doubt but that it was patterned after that contract and its drafters were aided by the discussion of the question therein made.

By the application of the rule above invoked the instrument before us cannot be characterized as a lease or transfer of any interest in real property because it lacks many of the essential elements of a lease, while on the other hand it bears all the characteristics of an agreement of hiring. But if it cannot be said to be an agreement of employment pure and simple, it cannot under any rule of construction be held to be more than a cropping contract. The right of entry or access is not, as it is contended, equivalent to possession as that word is used in a prohibitive sense. Access to the place upon which labor is to be performed is necessary for the execution of any conceivable contract of employment. Petitioner here is merely given access to the premises at all convenient times for the purpose of performing service. The situation in this respect is precisely as it would be if he were paid a daily or monthly wage. Under such employment no one would question his right to physically go upon and remain upon the premises. Every agreement or contract to perform farm labor must of necessity give the physical right to go upon the premises upon which the labor is to be done. In the contract under consideration nothing is said about leasing or letting the premises but on the contrary it is expressly provided that "all crops of every nature and character to be grown on said land shall belong to and be the property of the employer and the contractor shall have no interest, right or claim in or to any part of said crops, but his sole right shall be to the compensation paid by the employer" as provided by said agreement. (Italics ours.)

The fact that the crops are to be converted into money by the employer and divided on a net basis with the contractor could not work a transfer of any interest in the soil to the latter any more than the payment of wages made with moneys derived from the sale of the products of the soil under the most informal contract of employment would convey an interest in the soil to an employee who assisted in the labor of production.

The clause of the contract most criticized is the one which provides that "the employer shall have no control over the contractor and his employees." This clause amounts to no more than a statement of an implied privilege or right granted to every contractor, unless expressly limited, and has no special significance in determining the character of the agreement one way or the other. The above-quoted clause is immediately followed by the provision that the employer "if dissatisfied with the work done, or the progress of such work," may upon giving the contractor ten days' notice, terminate the contract. If the employer elects to terminate the contract, the contractor is to receive for his compensation the wages usually paid for the performance of similar work in the neighborhood. The contractor is not given a free hand to plant as he wills, but is specifically held to the planting of certain named varieties of berries of limited acreage, garden truck, and an orchard of 20 acres. All crops of every kind and character grown on the land shall belong to and be the property of the employer, and the contractor shall have no interest, right or claim to any part of said crops. By the abundance of the crops produced and the market price, less the cost of production, his compensation is fixed for the services performed.

[2] The authorities are quite general to the effect that a tenancy in common may exist in crops and none whatever exist in the land. This principle of law is recognized in Woodson v. Chatom, 65 Cal. Dec. 405; Clarke v. Cobb, 121 Cal. 595, 54 Pac. 74; Bernal v. Hovious, supra; Henderson v. Allen, 23 Cal. 519; Walls v. Preston, 25 Cal. 60; Baughman v. Reed, 75 Cal. 319, 17 Pac. 222, 7 Am. St. Rep. 170; Jones v. Durrer, 96 Cal. 95, 30 Pac. 1027; O'Brien v. Webb, supra; Smyth v. Tenkersley, 20 Ala. 212, 56 Am. Dec. 193.

In Henderson v. Allen, supra, it is said:

> "It has been repeatedly held that even the letting of land to a person to cultivate—the crops to be divided between the owner and the cropper, in certain proportions—did not amount to a lease, or create the relation of landlord and tenant between them. In such case, the owner is held to be in possession of the land, and the parties are joint tenants in the crop. [Citing authorities.] In such case, it is an agreement to work on shares, and not a lease to render rent, for which an action will lie against the tenant."

Warvelle on Ejectment, § 26, states the situation as follows:

> "It is common for parties to enter into agreements for the cultivation of land 'on shares,' that is, one person contributing the use of land while another plants and cultivates the crop, which, when harvested, is divided between them. It is well settled that such an agreement does not create a tenancy of any kind on the part of the cultivator. At best, he is only a tenant in common of the crop, which is generally regarded as personalty, and the legal possession of the land is in the owner."

See, also, Fuhrman v. Interior Warehouse Co., 64 Wash. 159, 116 Pac. 666, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 89; Taylor on Landlord and Tenant, vol. 1, § 24a; State v. Jewell, Collector, etc., 34 N. J. Law, 259.

In Taylor v. Donahoe, 125 Wis. 513, 103 N. W 1099, the distinction between a tenant and a cropper is clearly stated by the author of the opinion. It is there said:

> "The distinction between a tenant and a cropper is that a tenant has an estate in the land for a given time, and a right of property in the crops, and hence makes the division thereof between himself and the landlord in case of an agreement upon shares, while a cropper has no estate in the land, nor ownership of the crops, but is merely a servant, and receives his share of the crops from the landlord, in whom the title is. * * * It is always a question of construction of the agreement under which the parties are acting. The agreement in question here seems to us to be very clear and definite upon the subject. It nowhere refers to Finnegan as a tenant, but specifically refers to his work as 'service,' and expressly provides that Donahoe shall pay him for his service by certain shares of the crops, and that the possession of the land and ownership of the crops are to remain in Donahoe, and that Finnegan is merely to be an employee in the tilling of the land and caring for the stock. Language could hardly be plainer or more appropriate for the purpose of creating a cropper arrangement."

It will be noted that the phraseology in many of the instruments under consideration is that which is usually found in leases but the substance of the agreements being regarded the instruments were held to create the relationship of a tenancy in common. In some cases they purported on their faces to be leases. It is true that there may be created by the use of appropriate language, in a single instrument, the relationship of landlord and tenant and also the relationship of a tenancy in common in crops. But the intention of the parties and the nature of the covenants to be performed must be of such a character as to sustain such a construction. Nothing in the language of the instrument before us would permit of such a construction.

[3] The words "acquire, possess, enjoy and transfer" used in an inhibitory sense are well understood legal terms. "Acquire" as used in the law of contracts and descents means to become the owner of property; to make one's own. 1 Words and Phrases, 113. "Possess" used in reference to land titles and estates means to own; have as a belonging; property. Cent. Dict. "In popular usage the word 'possess' includes real and personal property to which one has title as his landed possessions." Webster's Dict.; 6 Words and Phrases, 54, 63, and cases cited. The word "enjoy" is one frequently found in instruments of transfer and means to make such use of the thing transferred as is consistent with the tenure by which it is held. "Transfer" is a word commonly used to denote a passing of title in property (usually realty) or an interest therein from one to another. The entire clause, if considered with reference to its context, leavès no room for doubt as to what is meant thereby. The purpose of the Alien Land Law, as is well said in O'Brien v. Webb, supra, "was apparently to prevent ownership and legal interest in farming lands from passing to aliens who never could become citizens; and there is nothing from which it can be legitimately inferred that the design of the law is to prevent an alien from entering into a cropping agreement whereby he gives his labor for a share in the crops to be raised." It must be presumed that the act was adopted by the people with full understanding on their part of the law of estates, tenures, and transfers as created by constitutional and legislative authority and as expounded by the courts of the land. It must further be presumed that the law was passed with full understanding on the part of the people of the state of existing laws governing or affecting cognate subjects. The argument that the law forbids the making of a contract of employment or agreement to till the soil on shares can only be sustained by adopting the theory that the particular agreement under consideration transfers an interest in land. To accept this theory it would become necessary to give a new and unwarranted interpretation to words and terms of ancient and established usage the meaning of which has long been settled by judicial pronouncements and legislative sanction.

The extreme care exhibited by the selection of terms to avoid a transfer of an interest in real property seems to have strengthened the conviction in the minds of counsel for the state that the entire transaction is a cunningly devised plan calculated to circumvent the law and defeat the object intended thereby to be accomplished. No undisclosed or secret designs on the part of either of the parties to the agreement, if any such really exist, have been revealed in this proceeding. and we cannot from the face of the instrument alone presume that any exist. If the agreement be but a subterfuge, as argued. by which illegal and forbidden purposes may be consummated, the state is not shorn of its power by anything here decided to show by legal evidence the true relationship existing between the parties by such conduct, facts, and circumstances as may tend to establish a relationship different from the one claimed to exist as in other cases charging conspiracy.

Courts are not clothed with legislative power. And it is not within the province of judicial tribunals to suggest what the state's policy should or should not be in respect to questions purely legislative in character. We can only say that we have examined the questions presented with care and feel convinced that we are not authorized by the language of the act under which the charge is laid to hold that the facts as presented are sufficient to justify us in holding that petitioner has committed a public offense. We are not at liberty to extend the application of the law to subjects not included within it either by express language or by fair implication.

The petitioner must therefore be discharged.

REYNOLDS v. REYNOLDS. (L. A. 7524.)

Appeal and error 🔑113(2)—Order refusing to vacate interlocutory and final decrees held not appealable.

Where interlocutory and final decrees were entered, and thereafter a motion to vacate such decrees was denied, the order denying vacation was not appealable; both the interlocutory and the final decrees being themselves appealable.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Suit by Louise Lawlor Reynolds against Lynn Fairfield Reynolds. From an order refusing to set aside findings and interlocutory and final decrees of divorce, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Francis G. Burke and N. A. Courtright, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ray L. Chesebro, of Los Angeles (Edward T. Winterer, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. This is an action for divorce. The plaintiff appeals from an order of the trial court refusing to vacate and set aside the findings, interlocutory and final decrees of divorce. It appears from the record that the court, upon the trial, decided that neither party was entitled to a divorce, although both had asked for one on the ground of extreme cruelty. The findings negative all of the allegations of cruelty made by the wife, who was plaintiff, but found affirmatively that the plaintiff had struck and threatened the defendant, had pulled his hair, and had called him some abusive epithets, and had taken a revolver and threatened to shoot the defendant; that she had assaulted him with a pair of shears, had knocked his tooth loose by a blow of her fist, and had kicked him on his legs and in the abdomen. The court further found:

> "That the said facts hereinbefore found do not amount to and are not sufficient to constitute extreme cruelty."

As a conclusion of law upon these facts the court declared that neither party was entitled to a decree of divorce. These findings were made October 8, 1918, and filed October 9, 1918, and on October 8, 1918, the court signed a decree denying a divorce, which decree was entered October 9, 1918. On February 11, 1919, defendant served notice of motion to vacate the decree, and change the conclusions of law so as to declare that the defendant was entitled to a decree of divorce upon the ground of extreme cruelty. This motion was granted April 15, 1919, the decree denying the divorce was vacated and an interlocutory decree of divorce entered upon the findings theretofore made, and upon the amended conclusions of law. More than a year thereafter, on December 21, 1921, the final decree of divorce was entered. On August 14, 1922, after due notice dated July 27, 1922, the plaintiff moved for the vacation of the interlocutory and final decrees upon the ground that the decree denying a divorce had become final before the application for its vacation was made, and that the court therefore had no jurisdiction to alter that judgment. The motion was denied September 6, 1922, and from this order denying her motion the plaintiff appeals.

At the outset it should be noted that the interlocutory decree of divorce entered April 15, 1919, was an appealable order, whether considered as an order made after final judgment or as an interlocutory decree of divorce. No appeal was taken from this decree, and it had become final long before the application here under consideration was made. The parties were present upon due notice at the time of the application of the defendant for the change of the conclusions of law. They had settled their property rights by contract, executed April 12, 1919, filed April 15, 1919, on the day of the granting of the motion, and approved by the trial judge on that date. This agreement recited that an interlocutory decree of divorce was granted April 9, 1919, although as a matter of fact the interlocutory decree was made April 15 and entered April 17, 1919. Furthermore, a stipulation was signed and filed by the attorneys, dated April 15, 1919, "that the court may immediately upon filing the findings of fact and amended conclusions of law enter its judgment in the above-entitled action, and incorporate therein the contract between the parties." (Italics ours.) Under these circumstances it is evident that the amendment to the findings and conclusions was the result of a stipulation of the parties inviting the court to make the order in question.

The order appealed from is not an appealable order because both the interlocutory and final decrees were appealable. De la Montanya v. De la Montanya, 112 Cal. 101, 44 Pac. 345, 32 L. R. A. 82, 53 Am. St. Rep. 165; Estate of Gregory, 122 Cal. 483, 55 Pac. 144; Estate of Baker, 170 Cal. 578, 150 Pac. 989.

The rule is well stated in 2 California Jurisprudence, § 30, p. 164 as follows:

> "If the grounds upon which the party sought to have a judgment vacated existed before the entry of the judgment and would have been available on an appeal from the judgment, an appeal will not lie from an order refusing the motion. The party aggrieved by a judgment or order must take his appeal from such judgment or order itself, if an appeal therefrom is authorized by statute, and not from a subsequent order refusing to set it aside. The reason for denying an appeal in the latter case is not because the order on the motion to vacate is not within the terms of section 963 of the Code, allowing appeals, for it may be, and indeed, an order refusing to vacate a final judgment is in its very nature a special order made after judgment, but because it would be virtually allowing two appeals from the same ruling, and would, in some cases, have the effect of extending the time for appealing contrary to the intent of the statute. A further reason is that the order on the motion is merely negative action of the court declining to disturb its first decision. The first decision being reviewable, the refusal to alter it any number of times will not make it less so."

Appeal dismissed.

LEMON v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF PASADENA. (L. A. 6967.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷1041(4)—Permitting filing of amended complaint at close of trial held not prejudicial.

Permitting the filing of an amended complaint at the close of trial in order to make the pleadings conform to the proof, which amended complaint was identical with the one already filed, except that it contained two additional counts, held not prejudicial.

2. Banks and banking ⚷227(3)—Evidence held to show agreement for investment of money in Russian rubles.

In an action against a bank to recover money paid by plaintiff to defendant in consideration of defendant's securing for plaintiff 6,000 Russian rubles, evidence held to establish that the parties in their negotiations had contemplated an investment by plaintiff of a sum sufficient at the current rate of exchange to purchase 6,000 Russian rubles and not an actual delivery of such currency to him, so that after defendant, through its correspondent, had secured plaintiff a credit or deposit of 6,000 rubles in a Petrograd bank payable on demand, a recovery of the money so expended was unwarranted.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by F. H. Lemon against the First National Bank of Pasadena. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Porter & Sutton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. The plaintiff in this action sought to recover from the defendant herein the sum of $1,962 with interest from September 14, 1916. His first amended complaint consisted of two counts, in the first of which he alleged that on the 14th day of September, 1916, he entered into an oral contract with the defendant, whereby the latter agreed that for and in consideration of the sum of $1,962 then and there paid by plaintiff it would deliver to plaintiff 6,000 Russian rubles, Petrograd, to wit, 6,000 rubles of Russian money; that said defendant then and there gave to plaintiff the following memorandum in writing of said transaction, viz.:

"The First National Bank of Pasadena, California.

"September 14, 1916.

"Mr. F. H. Lemon, 815 No. Holliston St., Pasadena, California—Dear Sir: This is to certify that we have purchased and have had forwarded for your account the sum of 6,000 rubles, Petrograd, which amount will be held for you against further instructions. We have charged your account as instructed $1,962.00 to cover.

"Yours truly, Jack Miller, Cashier."

The plaintiff then proceeds to allege that within a few days thereafter he was informed by said defendant through its said cashier that the defendant had purchased said rubles for plaintiff at $.324 each, charging as its commission therefor the sum of $18; that at the time of said transaction said rubles were reasonably worth the sum of $1,962 and so continued to be for a brief period, viz. for about one month thereafter; that at a later period the defendant informed plaintiff that it was unable to obtain said rubles by reason of the fact that there was no longer a recognized form of government in Russia; that thereafter and on or about October 3, 1919, plaintiff made an oral demand upon defendant for the return of said money so paid by him to it, but the said defendant failed and refused to comply with said demand; that thereafter and on December 19, 1919, said plaintiff gave notice of rescission and cancellation of said agreement, based upon the ground that the market value of said rubles had depreciated since the date of said agreement for their purchase, and on the further ground of the defendant's delay in the delivery of the same to the plaintiff. A copy of said notice of rescission is appended to said complaint.

The second count in plaintiff's said first amended complaint contains a recital in substance of the same transaction, but is based upon an alleged agency of the defendant for the plaintiff in making the purchase of said rubles and upon the failure and neglect of the defendant to comply with the terms of its said agency by making the purchase of said rubles within a reasonable time, by which said failure and neglect on the part of said defendant the plaintiff had suffered damages in the sum of $1,962.

The answer of the defendant, while denying the existence of said contract, written or oral, to deliver to plaintiff 6,000 rubles of Russian money, admits the making and delivery to the plaintiff of the memorandum of the transaction as above set forth, except as to the signature thereof, which it avers was by another of its officials, and denies that it has failed in any respect to perform the obligations of its agreement as embodied in said written memorandum, and avers that the transaction between the plaintiff and the defendant as evidenced thereby was one for the purchase by it for the plaintiff of Russian exchange, to wit, a draft on Petrograd for 6,000 Russian rubles, and that in pursuance thereof it purchased from the Anglo & London Paris National Bank of San Francisco Russian exchange for 6,000 rubles, receiving from the latter a certificate showing such purchase in the following form:

"The Anglo & London Paris National Bank of San Francisco.

"Sept. 12, 1916.

"This is to certify that we have purchased and forwarded for your account the sum of six thousand (R. 6,000) rubles, to our correspondent in Petrograd. This receipt is returnable against issue of formal certificate of deposit upon receipt of advice from our correspondents that same has been collected and placed to our credit.

"The Anglo & London Paris Nat'l Bank,
"H. Choynski, Asst. Cashier."

The defendant further avers that shortly thereafter and in pursuance of the foregoing document it received the following further certificate from the Anglo & London Paris National Bank of San Francisco, to wit:

"The Anglo & London Paris National Bank of San Francisco.

"December 18, 1916.

"Mr. F. H. Lemon has deposited with this bank rubles six thousand (6,000) held at the Russian Commercial & Industrial Bank, Petrograd, and payable on demand by our check on the Russian Commercial & Industrial Bank, Petrograd.

"The Anglo & London Paris National Bank,
"By Harry Choynski, Assistant Cashier."

It then alleges that the defendant fully informed plaintiff of the receipt of said certificate and offered to deliver the same to him, who made no objection to the same, but requested said defendant to hold the same for the time being for plaintiff, which the defendant has ever since done, and that it now holds and offers to deliver to plaintiff said certificate. The answer admits the plaintiff's alleged acts in his attempted rescission of said agreement, but denies that he was at any time entitled to rescind the same. The defendant further pleads that as to both alleged causes of action they are barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure and also by subdivision 1 of section 1691 of the Civil Code, by reason of the plaintiff's laches in the institution of said actions. The cause came to trial upon the issues thus framed.

The plaintiff on his own behalf and the defendant through its official who conducted the transaction each gave testimony as to the oral conference leading up to the investment of the plaintiff's money in Russian rubles. These witnesses do not, in the main, disagree as to the details of that oral conference, except that the witness for the defendant asserts, and the plaintiff denies, that the term "exchange" was used during said conference as indicating the nature of the transaction to be entered into by the defendant on the plaintiff's behalf. In the course of the trial there was also some disagreement between these witnesses as to whether the plaintiff was shown the certificate received by the defendant from the Anglo & London Paris National Bank, but there is substantially no dispute as to the fact that the defendant had proceeded to consummate some transaction in Russian rubles for the plaintiff's benefit and that the plaintiff understood this to be the fact and from time to time made inquiries as to the varying value of rubles down to the time in the year 1919 when the value of Russian rubles fell to practically nothing, due to the collapse of Russia. It was then for the first time that the plaintiff began making inquiries as to the nature of the transaction through the San Francisco bank, which resulted in his attempted rescission of the contract and transaction between himself and the defendant, and in this action for the recovery of the money originally paid by him on account thereof.

At the conclusion of the trial the plaintiff asked and was granted leave to file a further amended complaint for the avowed purpose of conforming the pleadings with the proofs; and in accordance with such leave he presently served and filed his second amended complaint, embracing four counts, the first two of which embodied in identical form the averments of the two counts in the former amended complaint, the third of which was in the form of a common count for money had and received, and the fourth of which was a substantial repetition of the first two counts with an added averment alleging the plaintiff's understanding or interpretation of the agreement between the parties. It was stipulated between the parties that no answer need be filed to this second amended complaint, and in fact no answer was filed thereto. The cause being submitted for decision, the trial court presently filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law in the case, wherein the court found:

"That heretofore, to wit, on the 14th day of September, 1916, said plaintiff, F. H. Lemon, employed said defendant the First National Bank of Pasadena, California, a corporation, as a broker for a consideration, to wit, the sum of $18, to be paid said defendant to purchase for said plaintiff 6,000 Russian rubles, Petrograd, at and for the sum of $.324 each, to wit, $1,844; that the said plaintiff then and there understood by said term '6,000 Russian rubles, Petrograd,' that said Russian rubles would be represented by currency of the Russian Empire or bond or bonds of the Russian Empire equal to the value of 6,000 Russian rubles, to wit, Russian money; that said defendant meant and intended thereby to procure for said plaintiff exchange on some Russian bank or banking institution for 6,000 Russian rubles to wit, Russian money; that said plaintiff did not state to said defendant the fact that said plaintiff understood by said terms that he was to receive currency of the Russian Empire or a bond or bonds of the Russian Empire equal to the value of 6,000 Russian rubles; that said defendant did not state to said plaintiff that it meant and intended to procure for plaintiff exchange on some bank or banking institution in Russia for 6,000 rubles; that the minds of plaintiff and the officers representing said defendant corporation in said transaction did not meet relative to the meaning of said term '6,000 Russian rubles, Petrograd,' and did not meet relative to the subject-matter of said transaction; that said plaintiff paid to said defendant the said $1,962 under belief that he, the said plaintiff, would procure, through the said defendant acting as the broker of said plaintiff, currency of the Russian Empire for said $1,844, or a bond or bonds of the Russian Empire equal to the value of said 6,000 Russian rubles, for the said $1,844; that the defendant did not procure for said plaintiff or deliver to said plaintiff at any time, or offer or tender to said plaintiff, currency of the Russian Empire equal to said 6,000 Russian rubles, or a bond or bonds of the Russian Empire equal to said 6,000 Russian rubles, or the value thereof; that the said defendant did not procure for the said plaintiff or tender to the said plaintiff exchange on any bank or banking institution in, or doing business in, the Russian Empire, or any exchange whatsoever for said 6,000 rubles, or any rubles."

After making the foregoing finding the trial court proceeded to find that the defendant did, on September 14, 1916, make and deliver to the plaintiff the memorandum first above set forth herein, but it further found that as to the transactions between the defendant and the Anglo & London Paris National Bank of San Francisco the plaintiff never authorized nor directed such transaction and that the defendant never delivered to the plaintiff the certificate issued on December 18, 1916, by said San Francisco institution showing that the transaction in Russian rubles exchange had been consummated. The court does not find that the plaintiff was not substantially informed by the defendant as to the consummation of said transaction in the manner indicated by said certificate or of the fact that it was holding the same subject to the plaintiff's direction during the several years that the plaintiff allowed to pass before repudiating said transaction. As conclusions of law the court found that the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendant the sum of $1,962 with interest thereon from September 14, 1916, at the legal rate, and that his cause of action therefor was not barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure nor by subdivision 1 of section 1691 of the Civil Code. Judgment was accordingly ordered and entered in the plaintiff's favor, and from such judgment the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The first contention of the appellant is that the trial court was in error in granting the plaintiff permission to file a further amended complaint at the close of the trial in order to make the pleadings conform to the proofs. This contention is predicated upon the appellant's claim that the plaintiff under said permission has filed an amended complaint containing two additional counts, in the fourth or last of which he has a new and distinct cause of action. The record does not, however, support this claim. All four counts in the plaintiff's last amended complaint relate to the same transaction and apply for the same relief. As to the two added counts the first of these is in form an action under the common count for money had and received, while the second of these is a restatement of the plaintiff's cause of action as set forth in the first count of his first amended complaint, with an added averment setting forth the plaintiff's interpretation or understanding of the agreement between the parties, the terms and conditions of which it is alleged the defendant violated. The addition of these two latter counts may not have been necessary, but it does not appear that the appellant was prejudiced by their insertion in the complaint upon which the plaintiff had proceeded to trial. The point therefore has no merit.

The appellant's next contention is that the trial court was in error in its finding that the minds of the parties had never met regarding the substance of the transaction between them, and that in the absence of such a meeting of the minds of the parties there was no valid agreement between them, and hence that the plaintiff was entitled to recover back his money. As to this finding of the trial court the record discloses neither pleading nor proof to support it. The plaintiff has not, in any of the counts of his complaint as amended, either before or after the trial, pleaded mistake of either law or fact as a ground for avoiding his agreement, nor does he seek to avoid his said agreement upon any such ground. It is true that he undertakes to set forth in the first, second, and fourth counts of his complaint his understanding or interpretation of the agreement between himself and the defendant, which, as he claims, the defendant violated, but if the proven facts in the case do not justify or support said interpretation, but rather negative it, the plaintiff would not be entitled to relief because of such misunderstanding of the terms and effect of his agreement in the absence of a showing by both pleading and proof that his consent to it had been obtained through that form of fraud defined and treated in sections 1565 to 1578, inclusive, of the Civil Code. In the absence of such showing the rules for the interpretation of contracts are those set forth in title three of the Civil Code. Had the trial court applied these ordinary and familiar rules to the transaction between these parties upon which this action is founded, it would not have found it necessary to make said finding, which has neither pleading nor proof to support it.

[2] As to the facts of this case, rightly interpreted, there is no material dispute. The plaintiff was a customer and depositor of the First National Bank of Pasadena, the defendant herein. On or about September 12, 1916, he entered said bank and there held an oral conference with its cashier. The purport of that conference was that the plaintiff desired to invest some of the money he then had on deposit in said bank in some safe securities. He was advised by said official of the bank to buy Russian rubles, and after some talk about the state of things in Russia he instructed the bank to make the investment for him. What the bank immediately proceeded to do as a result of that conference serves to indicate what the understanding of the parties was as to what it should do in conformity with the plaintiff's said direction, since it immediately instructed its correspondent, the Anglo & London Paris National Bank of San Francisco, having as its correspondent the Russian Commercial & Industrial Bank, Petrograd, Russia, to invest for said plaintiff the requisite sum of money at the then current rate of exchange and purchase 6,000 Russian rubles. In response to this instruction the said San Francisco bank transmitted to said defendant its above-quoted certificate under date of September 12, 1916, showing the nature of the transaction in so far as it was concerned. Upon the receipt of said certificate from its San Francisco correspondent the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff its own written memorandum of the transaction under date of September 14, 1916, which is also above quoted, and of which the plaintiff acknowledges the receipt. These written documents prevail over the uncertain recollection of the parties as to oral understandings and fix the nature of the transaction to be that of an investment in exchange. No other interpretation is in fact conceivable or consistent with the conduct of the parties throughout. The ruble is the gold monetary unit of Russia, worth at par about 51.5 cents. It would be valueless to use as money in Pasadena or to invest in as money for use there or elsewhere outside of Russia itself. The sole desirability of the Russian ruble for American investors in 1916 consisted in the fact that its exchange value in the money markets of the world was then 32.4 cents and that its said exchange value was fluctuating with the fortunes of Russia in the then impending European war. The fortunes of Russia were at the peak of their expectancy in September, 1916, as the undisputed evidence herein discloses, and the Pasadena bank, on its own behalf and on behalf of such of its customers as were seeking profitable investments, was dealing in Russian exchange. The use of the word "Petrograd," then the political capital and financial center of the Russian empire, in these several documents, is significant as indicating the place upon which bills of exchange were to be drawn, just as the use of the words "London" or "Paris" or "Vienna" are similarly significant according to common knowledge in similar dealings in exchange. The document received by the plaintiff from the defendant on September 14, 1916, informed the plaintiff in unmistakable terms that the proposed transaction in Russian rubles exchange on Petrograd had been consummated and his account charged with the sum of $1,962 to cover the investment.

The testimony of the plaintiff and the cashier of the defendant who conducted the transaction is in entire accord as to what occurred upon that and later occasions with relation to the investment. The plaintiff inquired as to the rate at which his investment in Russian rubles, Petrograd, had been made, and was informed that it was 32.4 cents, and that he should put his certificate away in his box and forget it till the war was over. He says that he inquired for the rubles, but it is too great a tax upon credence to believe that the plaintiff expected the bank to have at hand 6,000 Russian rubles which he had ordered purchased in Petrograd but two or three days before. From time to time thereafter for three years the plaintiff made occasional inquiries of the various bank officials as to what rubles were worth. In the meantime the bank, as his agent, had further consummated the transaction through the receipt in December, 1916, of a formal certificate of deposit from its San Francisco correspondent, which is also above set forth, showing the plaintiff was credited with a deposit of 6,000 Russian rubles held at the Russian Commercial & Industrial Bank, Petrograd, and payable on demand. The evidence is somewhat conflicting as to whether this certificate of deposit was ever actually inspected by the plaintiff, but there is no dispute as to the fact that the defendant received and held this certificate of deposit as the plaintiff's agent in the transaction and subject all times to his instructions; that it tendered the same to the plaintiff in 1919, when he made, for the first time, a demand for the return of his money; and that it has ever since held and still holds the same, subject to the plaintiff's order. It is true that the plaintiff testified that from time to time during these years he requested the delivery of his Russian rubles to him, but it is also true that the two documents above referred to; one of which he held and the other of which his bank and agent in the transaction held for him, afforded the most immediate and only practical means of obtaining possession of 6,000 Russian rubles, viz. converting said documents into the form of a draft upon the Russian bank for 6,000 rubles in identical form or in the form of American money at the then ruling rate of exchange.

Taking, therefore, the plaintiff's testimony as to his understanding of the transaction at its utmost value, it amounts to nothing more than that he had invested his money in 6,000 Russian rubles, and that, whether he had received or been entitled to receive them in the actual form of Russian money or in a certificate of deposit convertible into Russian or American money on demand, the status of his investment would be precisely the same, and his Russian rubles, whether in the hands of himself or his banking agent as actual money, or in the form of the certificate of deposit which had been issued to him, would be worth no more to him than their exchange value in the money markets of the world. The plaintiff at one point in his testimony speaks of his expectation that his money would be invested in some other form of Russian securities, but he offers no evidence showing either that the defendant was dealing in any other form of Russian securities or that any such investment was discussed, or that there were actually in existence in Pasadena or elsewhere any other form of Russian securities available for investment, or that any other investment was in the contemplation of the parties than that in Russian rubles which was actually made. Viewing the testimony in the case as a whole, the conclusion is irresistible that the transaction between the parties to this action was in the nature of an investment in Russian exchange; that the plaintiff at all times since the making of said investment was in a position, through the documents held by him or the defendant as his agent, to have taken advantage of any rise in the money market value of Russian rubles which would have rendered his investment profitable, and that having this advantage in his favor he was also at all times subjected to the disadvantage and liability of a further depreciation in the money market value of Russian rubles; and that, having suffered the loss of his money through such depreciation of Russian rubles to the point of a negligible valuation, he is endeavoring through this action to cast his loss upon the defendant, who was merely acting as his agent in good faith in the transaction. The finding of the trial court being predicated upon a misconception of the issues and being thus at variance with the proofs in the case as thus reviewed and interpreted, its judgment based upon such findings cannot be upheld.

We do not deem it necessary to discuss the question as to the effect of the defendant's plea of the bar of the statute of limitations.

Judgment reversed.

PEOPLE v. SCHMAH. (Cr. 1107.)

1. Homicide 🔑180—Evidence as to defendant's sobriety and circumstances attending driving of automobile on public highway at time of fatality held admissible.

In view of Motor Vehicle Act, §§ 17, 20, and 22, providing that no person under the influence of intoxicating liquor shall drive a motor vehicle on any public highway, in a prosecution for manslaughter for driving over a child while the question of intent was immaterial, evidence as to defendant's sobriety and the circumstances attending his driving at the time of the fatality were admissible.

2. Criminal law 🔑822(1)—Instructions reviewed as a whole.

To declare whether the law was properly given for the jury's guidance, the appellate court looks, not to an isolated excerpt from instructions, but to the charge as a whole.

3. Criminal law 🔑761(6, 11)—Instruction held not to assume commission of crime nor defendant's intoxication.

In manslaughter prosecution wherein charge was driving automobile over child while intoxicated, an instruction that no act committed by one while voluntarily intoxicated is less criminal because of his having been in such condition, but whenever motive or intent is a necessary element to constitute any particular crime the jury may consider accused's intoxication in determining motive or intent, did not assume that a crime had been committed and that defendant was intoxicated.

4. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Instruction injecting possible immaterial element did not prejudice defendant.

In a prosecution for manslaughter for running down a child on the highway, the possible injecting into the case of an immaterial element verging on error, by instructing that no act committed by a person while in a state of voluntary intoxication is less criminal because of his having been in such condition, did not prejudice defendant in respect to a substantial right (Pen. Code, § 1404).

5. Criminal law ⚷822(9)—Instruction on acts committed in state of voluntary intoxication held not misleading in view of other instructions.

Where a drunken driver drove his automobile over a child in the highway, in prosecution for manslaughter thereof, an instruction that no act committed by one in a state of voluntary intoxication is less criminal by reason of his having been in such a condition, but, whenever existence of a motive or intent is a necessary element to constitute crime, then to take into consideration the fact that defendant was intoxicated at the time in determining motive or intent with which he committed the act, when taken in connection with other proper instructions given, was not misleading or confusing.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Xavier Schmah was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Jos. McInerney and R. P. Henshall, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ST. SURE, J. Defendant drove his automobile over Carl Grove, eight years of age, fracturing the boy's skull, as a result of which he died. The jury found a verdict of guilty of manslaughter as charged, and defendant appeals from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Counsel for defendant, in their opening brief, state the points as follows:

"There are two questions involved on this appeal. The first arises in connection with the meaning of an instruction to the jury concerning the intent of the defendant. In this regard the court gave section 22 of the Penal Code, which provides, in substance, that intoxication is no excuse for crime, but where a particular intent is necessary for the commission of a particular crime the jury may take into consideration the fact of intoxication. The other concerns the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict in view of this instruction; that is, where malice is no element of the crime, as here, and the act is made criminal because of the statute concerning negligence, is the evidence sufficient to justify the verdict where the court erroneously introduced into the case the issue:

"(a) That the act was not less criminal because the defendant was intoxicated; and

"(b) That they could look to the fact of his intoxication for the purpose of determining what his intent was when the question of his intent was entirely immaterial."

The instruction complained of reads as follows:

"The court instructs you that no act committed by a person while in a state of voluntary intoxication is less criminal by reason of his having been in such condition, but whenever the actual existence of any particular purpose, motive, or intent is a necessary element to constitute any particular species or degree of crime, the jury may take into consideration the fact that the accused was intoxicated at the time in determining the purpose, motive, or intent with which he committed the act."

The evidence shows that on the afternoon of April 15, 1922, the defendant, accompanied by another person, was driving his automobile northerly along Nineteenth avenue, San Francisco. His automobile was "zigzagging down the street," at a rate of speed in excess of 30 miles an hour. Driving northerly he should have been on the right-hand side of the street, but it was shown that his automobile cut through some sand piled on the left-hand side of the street, in front of a building in course of construction. A short distance north of the sand pile, the deceased and his older brother were crossing the street. The older brother stepped back in time to avoid being struck by the automobile, but the younger one was struck down and run over, in the presence of his brother; his mother being but a few feet distant.

The following epitome of the evidence on the question of defendant's intoxication is mainly gathered from the briefs filed on behalf of defendant, and is fully supported by the record:

Dr. John E. Bohm testified that when the defendant was brought to the emergency hospital he was "diagnosed as being slightly intoxicated," but that he carried on a conversation intelligently; that he did not stagger; that his conversation was coherent, but his mentality slow, and he admitted that he had been drinking; that he could smell the odor of alcohol on his breath.

M. A. Klein testified that he saw the defendant coming down the street, that he was exceeding the 30-mile speed limit and was "zigzagging down the street," and that he saw the boy hit by the automobile. This witness also testified that the defendant spoke incoherently, was irrational, and that he was drunk.

Mrs. Mary U. Klein described seeing the preliminary incidents to the accident. She saw the defendant drive down the sidewalk, then into the middle of the street, "zigzagging down the street." She said the defendant was drunk.

Andrew Hinsch testified that he did not detect the odor of any particular liquor on the breath of defendant, but that his appearance was that he was intoxicated.

Richard L. Ingham, a retired police officer, was in the vicinity at the time of the accident, and he observed the condition of the defendant and testified that he was drunk.

William C. Pennycook testified that he saw the defendant at the time of the accident and that he was very much under the influence of liquor.

Hezekiah Coombs, police officer, testified that he saw the defendant at the wheel of the automobile and placed him under arrest, and that the defendant was drunk.

A. A. Sutton, a police officer, stated that he saw the defendant on the date in question, that he observed his demeanor, and that, while he would say the defendant was under the influence of liquor, he would not say he was drunk.

Daniel A. Fogarty, a police officer, testified that he received a certain flask from Officer Coombs in the condition the officer testified he found it in the possession of the defendant. Clinton G. Davis, city chemist, testified to analyzing the liquor contained in the flask and found it to contain alcohol 43.32 per cent. He described the liquor as "bootleg whisky," about 86 per cent. proof.

Nicholas Delaney, defendant's companion in the automobile, testified that defendant and himself had drunk together two or three bottles of home-brew beer; that the defendant, while in the machine, partook of no liquor, nor did he see any liquor in the car or elsewhere; and that the defendant was not drunk. Defendant testified that he drank three bottles of beer and nothing else; that he was not a drinking man; that he does not drink hard liquor at all; that he was not intoxicated.

[1, 2] The Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 397, as amended by St. 1917, p. 382) § 17, provides that no person who is under the influence of intoxicating liquor shall drive or operate a motor vehicle on any public highway within this state. Section 20 of said act further provides that "the driver or operator of any vehicle in or upon any public highway shall drive such vehicle in a careful manner with due regard for the safety and convenience of pedestrians"; and this inhibition is repeated in another form in section 22. While it is true that in a case of manslaughter the question of intent is immaterial, yet, under the law in the instant case, evidence as to defendant's sobriety, and the circumstances attending his driving a motor vehicle upon the public highway at the time of the fatality, were clearly admissible. The atmosphere of the case evidencing intoxication on the part of the defendant was the result of his own condition and acts. It is unquestioned that the defendant had been drinking. The instructions given by the court told the jury that they were the exclusive judges of the facts, the weight of the evidence, and the credibility of the witnesses. The Code definition of "murder" and "manslaughter" were given, and the distinction between these crimes and the elements composing and appertaining to each were properly defined. The instructions further told the jury that before they could convict the defendant they "must be satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt that the death of the deceased ensued as a direct and proximate result of the reckless or gross neglect of the defendant." "Reasonable doubt" was defined, likewise "criminal negligence." Appropriate sections of the Motor Vehicle Act were quoted. Several instructions were given on the subject of intoxication which preceded and followed the language of section 22 of the Penal Code. The instructions further told the jury that the death of the decedent might have been accidental or caused by mistake, in which event their verdict should be not guilty. Again and again the jury were admonished that they were the sole and exclusive judges of the evidence, and that they could not find the defendant guilty unless they were satisfied of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. The instructions further told the jury of the presumption of innocence, and how the law clothes the defendant with an ordinary good character for the traits involved in the accusation. To declare whether or not the law was properly given for the guidance of the jury, we are to look, not to an isolated excerpt from the instructions, but to the charge as a whole. People v. Besold, 154 Cal. 363, 370, 97 Pac. 871, and cases cited therein. The instructions were quite comprehensive, being such as are usually given in manslaughter cases, and were fair to the defendant.

[3, 4] Counsel for defendant assert that the instruction complained of "without any qualification assumed, first, that a crime had been committed, and, secondly, that the defendant was intoxicated." We do not agree with this contention. Nowhere in the instructions do we find that the court either assumes that a crime was committed or that defendant was intoxicated. We agree with the Attorney General that because the court gives an instruction upon the law appertaining to murder, it cannot be said that the court thereby assumes or suggests that the defendant is guilty of murder. If the court gives a general instruction upon the law of accomplices, it cannot be said that the court assumes that the defendant was guilty of participation in the crime; and where, under the law and under the circumstances of a case such as this, a court gives a general instruction upon the question of intoxication, it does not thereby instruct the jury as a matter of fact that the defendant was intoxicated. It may be that the court, in the instant case, by the instruction complained of, injected into the case an immaterial element verging on error; but even so, we are wholly unable to see how such instruction in any way actually prejudiced the defendant or tended to his prejudice, in respect to a substantial right. Section 1404, Pen. Code. The practical administration of justice should not be defeated by a too rigid adherence to a close and technical analysis of the instructions to the jury. People v. Bruggy, 93 Cal. 476, 483, 29 Pac. 26.

[5] We have seen that the language of the instruction is contained in section 22 of the Penal Code. Whether an abstract instruction will call for a reversal of a case depends on the determination of the question whether, as a result of the instruction, prejudice resulted to the complaining party. It is generally agreed that legal abstractions in a charge are not always hurtful, and, unless it appears that they have been made so, the giving of them, while never to be approved, is not reversible error. 14 R. C. L. § 49, p. 783. There may, and no doubt do, arise cases in which an abstract proposition of law would be and is harmful to the accused. But this is not one of them. People v. Rowland, 12 Cal. App. 6, 24, 106 Pac. 428. We think the instruction, when taken in connection with the other instructions given, did not mislead or confuse the jury, and that the defendant had a fair trial.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LA RUE et al. (Cr. 684.)

1. Criminal law 🔑409—Corpus delicti not provable by defendant's extrajudicial statements and admissions.

The corpus delicti cannot be established by defendant's extrajudicial statements and admissions, though made under oath in the trial of another action.

2. Criminal law 🔑409—Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Membership in organization promoting criminal syndicalism may be shown by defendants' extrajudicial admissions; "conspiracy."

Membership in an organization, "organized and assembled to advocate, teach, and aid and abet criminal syndicalism" is not an essential element of the corpus delicti of the crime, as defined by Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subd. 4, and hence may be established by defendants' extrajudicial statements and admissions; the organization itself, which is a criminal "conspiracy" or partnership, constituting the corpus delicti, and proof of membership therein being necessary merely to connect defendants with the crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Conspiracy.]

3. Criminal law 🔑780(1)—Instruction as to necessity of corroboration of accomplice's testimony should be given, though testimony is corroborated.

Where the prosecution relies for conviction on the testimony of an accomplice, an instruction, in the language of Pen. Code, § 1111, that a conviction cannot be had on such testimony unless corroborated by other evidence connecting defendant with the commission of the offense, should be given, though the testimony is corroborated, as the jury may reject the corroborating evidence as unworthy of belief.

4. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Refusal to instruct as to necessity of corroboration of accomplice's testimony held not reversible error.

Refusal to instruct as to the necessity of corroboration of an accomplice's testimony held not reversible error, in view of defendants' admissions and other corroborative evidence as to the corpus delicti; no miscarriage of justice having resulted, as required by Const. art. 6, § 4½.

5. Criminal law 🔑369(2)—Evidence of crimes by former members of organization of which defendants were members held admissible to establish character thereof in prosecution for criminal syndicalism.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, evidence of crimes committed by former members of an organization, of which defendants were members, held admissible to establish the character of the organization as one organized and assembled to advocate, teach, aid, and abet criminal syndicalism, in violation of Criminal Syndicalism Act.

6. Criminal law 🔑1169(2)—Admission of hearsay testimony as to unlawful acts by members of organization of which defendants were members held harmless error.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, admission of hearsay testimony that a member of an organization, of which defendants were members, said, in its hall, in the presence of the local secretary and other members, including the witness, that he had placed acid in several men's shoes because they would not quit their employment, and that members who had gone with him to start fires said that they had done so, held harmless error, in view of other evidence of such acts and other unlawful acts by members of such organization.

7. Criminal law 🔑1129(3)—Appellate court will not search record for errors not specifically pointed out by appellant.

The appellate court will not search the record for errors to which particular attention has not been called by appellant.

8. Criminal law 🔑1169(1)—Admission of hearsay evidence not reversible error, if so inconsiderable as not to injure defendants.

While a court should carefully guard against admission of hearsay evidence, admission thereof, where a wide range of evidence is permissible to prove a fact, is not reversible error, if so inconsiderable that it could not have injured defendants.

9. Witnesses 🔑327—Proof that witness was or is subject to insane delusions admissible to affect credibility.

Proof that a witness was or is subject to insane delusions, or that his mind and memory are impaired by disease, is admissible to affect his credibility.

10. Criminal law 🔑1170½(5)—Refusal to permit cross-examination of witness as to former confinement in hospital with general paresis held not reversible error.

Refusal to permit cross-examination of a witness as to whether he had been in a hospital undergoing treatment for general paresis, held not reversible error, where he displayed no mental weakness throughout a long examination by both parties.

11. Criminal law 🔑829(3)—Instruction held substantially covered by instruction given.

In a criminal syndicalism prosecution, refusal of an instruction that persons may advocate peaceable changes in our Constitution, laws, or form of government, held not error, where the court instructed the jury that it is proper to seek desired changes in political and industrial control, but that criminal or unlawful means are punishable under the act prohibiting criminal syndicalism; such instruction substantially embracing the proposition contained in the one refused.

12. Criminal law 🔑1169(2)—No reversal for errors relating to proof of fact so overwhelmingly proved as to show no miscarriage of justice.

A judgment of conviction will not be reversed for errors relating to proof of a fact so overwhelmingly proved as to show no miscarriage of justice.

Appeals from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Charles B. La Rue, Pete Beazley, William Rutherford, Thomas O'Mara, John Francis Nash, H. B. Edwards, Andrew E. Anderson, B. Kyler, Thomas Zangar, and Walter Smith, were convicted of criminal syndicalism, and they appeal. Affirmed.

W. F. Herron and S. Luke Howe, both of Sacramento, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The indictment charges that the defendants were members of the Industrial Workers of the World, "organized and assembled to advocate, teach, and aid and abet criminal syndicalism." They were tried jointly and found guilty as charged. Their motion for a new trial was denied, and separate judgments of conviction were entered. From such judgments and the order denying their motion for a new trial the defendants have appealed. The appeals are prosecuted jointly on a single record.

During the latter part of March and the early part of April, 1922, J. A. Casdorf and Earl Firey were on trial in the superior court of Sacramento county on a charge of criminal syndicalism. All of the defendants herein were called as witnesses by the defendants in that case, and respectively testified that they were then and, for periods of time ranging from a few months to several years prior thereto, had been members of the Industrial Workers of the World. The indictment herein was thereafter returned against them, based apparently upon such testimony. Their testimony so given was introduced in evidence by the people at the trial herein. When such evidence was offered, counsel for the defendants admitted that they had so testified, but objected to its introduction on other grounds. The only other testimony bearing upon the question of membership is that of William E. Townsend, a witness for the prosecution, who testified to facts tending to show that defendants Smith, O'Mara, and Zangar were members of the organization.

[1] Appellants contend that their membership in the organization is an essential element of the corpus delicti. If this contention be well founded then the judgments against seven of the defendants must be reversed, because few propositions of law are better settled than that the corpus delicti cannot be established by the extrajudicial statements and admissions of a defendant, without other and independent proof of the substance of the crime charged. People v. Vertrees, 169 Cal. 404, 408, 146 Pac. 890. The fact that the admissions were made under oath in the trial of another action does not render them the less extrajudicial. Wharton's Criminal Evidence (10th Ed.) p. 1277; People v. Chadwick, 4 Cal. App. 63, 87 Pac. 384, 389. It is necessary then to determine what constitutes the corpus delicti in this case.

[2] Section 2 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act (Stats. 1919, p. 281) defines five offenses in as many subdivisions. All but the fourth relate to individual acts which are made unlawful in themselves without reference to any organization, society, group, or assemblage of persons. The fourth subdivision provides that any person is guilty of a felony who "organizes or assists in organizing, or is or knowingly becomes a member of, any organization, society, group or assemblage of persons organized or assembled to advocate, teach or aid and abet criminal syndicalism." If the word "conspiracy" were substituted for the words "organization, society, group or assemblage," the meaning of subdivision 4 would be in no wise changed. It has been said:

> "A conspiracy is constituted by an agreement, * * * but it is the result of the agreement, rather than the agreement itself, just as a partnership, although constituted by a contract, is not the contract but is a result of it. The contract is instantaneous, the partnership may endure as one and the same partnership for years. A conspiracy is a partnership in criminal purposes. That as such it may have continuation in time is shown by the rule that an overt act of one partner may be the act of all without any new agreement specifically directed to that act." United States v. Kissel, 218 U. S. 601, 31 Sup. Ct. 124, 54 L. Ed. 1168.

The organization here in question is clearly embraced in the foregoing definition of conspiracy, and that it constitutes a conspiracy would hardly be questioned. In People v. Steelik, 187 Cal. 361, 376, 203 Pac. 78, 84, the organization is referred to as "an organization which in its nature was a criminal conspiracy." To conspire to do a forbidden act is the equivalent of becoming a member of a conspiracy to do the act.

> "It is the nature of the purpose or the nature of the means to obtain the purpose, as the case may be, which imports to the combination, agreement or confederacy its criminal character." 5 R. C. L. 1066.

The gist of the offense denounced by subdivision 4 is the criminal confederacy. The mere phraseology of the statute is unimportant. Several of the defendants were members when the statute was enacted. Each of them is punishable "because after the statute was passed he violated the terms thereof by knowingly remaining a member." People v. Steelik, supra. In other words, he continued a member of the criminal partnership and is liable as a partner for its continued criminal character. It seems clear that the criminal organization constitutes the corpus delicti. Proof of membership therein serves only to connect the defendants with the crime. Proof of the killing of a human being by a criminal agency establishes the corpus delicti in homicide, without any evidence tending to show who committed the act. After such proof has been made, the fact that the defendant struck the fatal blow may be shown by his extrajudicial admissions alone. No reason is perceived why the same rule is not applicable here. The admissions of the defendants were not confessions. No inference that a crime had been committed arose from them alone. They were of no value as evidence until criminality was established by other independent evidence. That which such other evidence established, therefore, must constitute the corpus delicti, the substance of the crime. The necessity of proving the membership of the defendants in order to justify a conviction does not show that such membership is an element of the corpus delicti. Proof that a defendant entered the building alleged in a charge of burglary is necessary to sustain a conviction, yet the fact that the particular person charged made the entry is not an element of the corpus delicti, which may be established by proof that an unknown person made the burglarious entry. Proof that the person charged made such entry is necessary only for the purpose of connecting him with the crime. The admissions in this case are in no manner discredited by the uncertainties and doubts which often attend proof of this character. It is admitted that they were made voluntarily under oath in the trial of a criminal action of a like nature to that for which the defendants were tried. Relative to the value of confessions, it is said:

> "Assuming the making of a confession to be a completely proved fact—its authenticity beyond question and conceded—then it is certainly true that we have before us the highest sort of evidence. The confession of a crime is usually as much against a man's permanent interests as anything well can be; and, in Mr. Starkie's phrase, no innocent man can be supposed ordinarily to be willing to risk life, liberty, or property by a false confession. Assuming the confession as an undoubted fact, it carries a persuasion which nothing else does, because a fundamental instinct of human nature teaches each one of us its significance." Wigmore on Evidence, § 866.

To hold that the admissions of the defendants admitted in evidence in this case are not sufficient proof of their membership would be to carry an overworked doctrine to the extreme of absurdity.

[3, 4] Such admissions, as stated, did not tend in any degree to show the criminal character of the organization. The people attempted to show such character by the testimony of former members thereof, corroborated by other evidence. The court refused to give an instruction proposed by the defendants in the language of section 1111 of the Penal Code, which provides that "a conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense." Where the prosecution relies for a conviction upon the testimony of an accomplice, even though corroborated, the proposed instruction should be given, because the jury may reject the corroborating evidence as unworthy of belief, and in such case the instruction would be vital. It remains to be determined whether the refusal to give the instruction has resulted in a miscarriage of justice, because the Constitution forbids the reversal of a judgment "on the ground of misdirection of the jury, * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." Article 6, § 4½. As pointed out, the evidence tending to connect the defendants with the commission of the offense is of the most trustworthy and positive character, being their own deliberate admissions. The evidence corroborating the testimony of the accomplices as to the corpus delicti is overwhelming. In addition to a large quantity of literature which in itself conclusively shows the criminal character of the organization, the testimony of the witness Coutts, a former member, was corroborated in many important particulars. He testified that in the summer of 1917, on a houseboat near Stockton, he was associated with a member of the organization, known as Robert Connellan, in preparing various contrivances for the purpose of injuring and destroying property. The then chief of police of Stockton, Wm. M. Simpson, testified that during that summer he saw Connellan selling I. W. W. literature in Stockton, and that he saw Connellan and Coutts together on the houseboat, where they had many tools and chemicals, which he later took into his possession. The chemicals and other articles were identified by Simpson and admitted in evidence. L. E. Happell, a chemist, testified that among such exhibits there were powdered emery, phosphorous, sulphuric acid, potassium nitrate, potassium chlorate, sulphuric acid added to potassium ferrocyanide, and a 20 per cent. solution of potassium hydroxide. Coutts testified that these substances were prepared and kept for various uses, such as injuring the bearings on machinery, starting incendiary fires, poisoning live stock, and putting the last-named chemical in the shoes of laboring men who refused to join the I. W. W. He testified that at a meeting of the organization held in its hall in Stockton, about October 1, 1917, a motion was made to send a committee to Modesto "to smoke up the town," because a delegate had been arrested there for selling I. W. W. literature; that the chairman of the meeting stated that such a motion could not appear upon the minutes "but if had to be done * * * that there was men there that knew how to do it"; that the witness and three others, one apparently the chairman of the meeting, immediately after the adjournment thereof, prepared some phosphorous "kitties" for the purpose of starting fires, and later went to Modesto, where they placed the kitties in various barns, causing several fires. G. J. Davis, who was then a deputy sheriff at Modesto, testified that between the hours of 10:10 p. m. on the 6th of October, 1917, and 3:05 the next morning eight different fires started in Modesto. He also testified that numerous isolated stacks of hay were burned during the summer of 1917. Other corroborative evidence was introduced, but space forbids the enumeration of any considerable number of the crimes concerning which the former members testified or the corroboration thereof. It is sufficient to say that there is ample corroboration of much of the testimony of at least two of the accomplices. In view of the conclusive character of the evidence, it cannot be said that the refusal to give the proposed instruction has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

[5] Appellants contend that it was error to admit evidence of the crimes committed by the former members. Such evidence was admissible to establish the character of the organization. People v. Steelik, supra. The evidence was very similar to and much of it identical with that in the case of People v. Roe (Cal. App.) 209 Pac. 381, in which the judgment was affirmed.

[6] It is contended that the court erred in admitting hearsay declarations. Coutts was permitted to testify that in the I. W. W. hall in Stockton, in the presence of the local secretary and other members, including the witness, Connellan said that he had placed potassium hydroxide in several men's shoes, including those of Joe Arada, on one occasion, because they would not quit their employment. Arada testified that on the occasion referred to 14 or 15 men came to the place where Arada and others were employed and worked during one afternoon; that they slept that night in the same room which the other men occupied, and all the newcomers left the next morning before breakfast, leaving some I. W. W. literature on the floor where they had slept; that the feet of himself and the other men were injured by some acid which had been placed in their shoes, those of witness seriously. It is clear that the testimony as to what Connellan said he had done was hearsay, in so far as proof of the fact stated by him is concerned. It does not clearly appear whether such statement was made at an authorized meeting of the organization. If made at an authorized meeting, then the testimony was admissible, not as proof of the fact stated, but in connection with any action or omission to take action by the organization relative thereto, as showing its attitude toward the commission of such crimes by its members. In any event, there was other evidence which justified the inference that members of the organization had placed acid in the men's shoes on the occasion mentioned, and, in view of the innumerable unlawful acts committed by members thereof, as shown by the evidence, it is not believed that the admission of the evidence of which complaint is made could have prejudiced the rights of the defendants.

[7, 8] Coutts testified that on two occasions he went out with other members to place kitties for the purpose of starting fires, and that a number of fires occurred immediately thereafter. He was then permitted to testify that after the fires had started some of the members who had gone with him said they had placed some of the kitties. The testimony as to what the other men said, being a statement of a past event, was purely hearsay and should have been excluded. From the testimony properly admitted, however, to the effect that the members went out for the purpose of setting fires and that fires immediately thereafter occurred at the places where they had gone, the inference naturally arises that they had started them, and the admission in evidence of their subsequent declarations that they had done so was harmless error. Counsel for appellants say that there are "many other instances in which the trial judge allowed witnesses to testify as to unsworn statements of others which were a mere narration of past events," but they fail to point them out. It is incumbent upon an appellant to point out specifically the errors relied on. The testimony covers more than 700 pages of the transcript, and this court must not be expected to search through the long record for errors to which particular attention has not been called. A few minor errors similar to those discussed have been discovered, but it is sufficient to say that none of them are prejudicial. While a court should carefully guard against the admission of hearsay evidence, in a case where so wide a range of evidence is permissible for the purpose of proving the character of an organization, some improper evidence usually creeps into the record, but in this case the hearsay evidence admitted is comparatively, as said in the anarchists' case (Spies v. People, 122 Ill. 1, 12 N. E. 865, 17 N. E. 898, 3 Am. St. Rep. 320), "so inconsiderable that it could not have in any way injured" the defendants.

[9] The testimony of the witness Townsend embraced his criminal activities as a member of the I. W. W. in a large number of states. He testified that during March, April, May, and June, 1921, he was in the employ of the Citizens' Alliance of Minneapolis. The court sustained the people's objection to the following question:

> "During the period of time that you say you were in the employ of the Citizens' Alliance in Minneapolis, isn't it the fact that you were in the Minneapolis General Hospital undergoing treatment for general paresis?"

Counsel for defendants explain the purpose of the question to the trial court as an effort to prove by the witness that at the time stated he was "suffering from incipient general paresis, which of course produces insanity, and it is incipient insanity." The objection should have been overruled.

> "It is admissible * * * in order to affect the credibility of the witness, to prove that he was or is subject to insane delusions; that his mind and memory are impaired by disease." Wharton's Criminal Evidence (10th Ed.) § 370a.

[10] Such proof may be made by examining the witness himself. Id., 370b; People v. Haydon, 18 Cal. App. 543, 123 Pac. 1102, 1114; People v. Salladay, 22 Cal. App. 552, 135 Pac. 508. While it must be conceded that the ruling of the court was erroneous, it is extremely doubtful whether defendants suffered any prejudice thereby. Whatever may be said of the character or trustworthiness of the witness, he endured the ordeal of a long examination on the witness stand by both parties without any apparent display of mental weakness. From the nature of general paresis, it is highly improbable that one who was in a stage of the disease requiring his confinement in a hospital at a given time would have the mental capacity, 18 months later, to undergo a long examination in court with the intelligence which the witness displayed.

[11] The court refused to give an instruction proposed by the defendants to the effect that persons have "the right to advocate peaceable changes in our Constitution, laws or form of government." At defendant's request the court instructed the jury:

> "It is proper to seek desired changes in political and industrial control but when criminal or unlawful means are used to effect political control the means are punishable under the act defining and prohibiting criminal syndicalism."

The instruction given substantially embraces the proposition of law contained in the one refused.

[12] All the errors committed relate to the proof of the unlawful character of the organization. The proof thereof is so overwhelming that an examination of the whole case, not only fails to show a miscarriage of justice, but affirmatively shows that a reversal would constitute a miscarriage of justice.

The judgments and orders are affirmed.

GLOBE GRAIN & MILLING CO. v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (Civ. 4167.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District. Division 1, California. May 25, 1923.)

1. Taxation 🔑490—On application for reduction of valuation, decision of board of equalization within limits of reasonable discretion is conclusive.

Where the issue is solely one of correct valuation in assessing property subject to taxation, a dissatisfied taxpayer must rely on his right to apply to the board of equalization for a reduction, and the board's decision within limits of reasonable discretion, after due hearing, is final and conclusive.

2. Taxation 🔑543(6)—Taxpayer not within rule applying to recovery of taxes paid, unless facts alleged exhibit a void assessment.

Though a taxpayer may have relief under Pol. Code, § 3819, where he claims an assessment void, by paying under protest the tax assessed, and within 6 months thereafter bringing action to recover it back he cannot bring himself under the rule by a mere statement in the complaint that the assessment was void unless the fact alleged in support of that conclusion exhibit a void assessment.

3. Taxation ⚷543(6)—Complaint by corporation to recover taxes paid held not to show void assessment, so as to entitle it to recover.

Where a corporation had large solvent credits primarily subject to taxation, though in the valuation thereof it was entitled on proper application to reduction by debts due to bona fide residents pursuant to Const. art. 13, § 1 (Pol. Code, §§ 3628, 3629), a claim in a complaint by it to recover taxes paid under protest on such credits that their valuation thereof should have been reduced to nothing by debts due is the same as a claim for a reduction to any other amount less than that shown by the valuation of the assessment, and the complaint only shows a claim based on an alleged excessive valuation of such credits owned by it, and does not show a void assessment, so as to entitle it to recover the taxes paid under protest as provided by section 3819, where the taxpayer claims the assessment void.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by the Globe Grain & Milling Company against the County of Los Angeles. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. G. Van Pelt, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. J. Hill, County Counsel, and Gordon Boller, Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Plaintiff paid under protest a tax levied against it on solvent credits assessed as property of the plaintiff. Plaintiff's demand for repayment of this tax having been refused, it brought this action. The defendant's demurrer to the second amended complaint was sustained, and the plaintiff failed to make any further amendment. Thereupon judgment was entered in favor of the defendant. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

In the complaint it is alleged that in the assessment of plaintiff's property for the year 1919 by the county assessor of the county of Los Angeles there were wrongfully and unlawfully included as property belonging to the plaintiff solvent credits amounting to $1,559,850; that said assessment so set down was illegal and void in that plaintiff, at 12 o'clock m. of the first Monday of March, 1919, owed debts and unsecured liabilities to bona fide residents of the state of California and firms, associates, and corporations doing business in said state in excess of said sum, "which said debts and liabilities had been claimed as a deduction from said assessment by plaintiff"; that thereafter, in July, 1919, plaintiff duly appeared before the board of equalization of said county and requested that said assessment be changed by reducing said assessment of solvent credits to nothing; that said board of equalization upon a hearing of said request did reduce said assessment of solvent credits to $798,780, but failed and refused to reduce said solvent credits to nothing. The assessment and levy having followed in due course, the tax was paid under written protest duly filed.

It is alleged that the assessment and levy and the tax so paid were illegal and void by reason of the failure to allow for and deduct from the amount of solvent credits returned by the plaintiff said debts and deductions allowed by law and claimed by the plaintiff, which consisted of unsecured liabilities owing by the plaintiff to bona fide residents of the state of California and to firms, associations, and corporations doing business therein, and that there were not at 12 o'clock m. on the first Monday of March, 1919, in the state of California, or subject to the jurisdiction of said county or state, any solvent credits owned by plaintiff subject to assessment or tax for said tax year 1919, had said debts and deductions allowed by law and claimed by plaintiff been allowed by said assessor and by said board of equalization.

[1] It is conceded by appellant to be the law that, where the question at issue is solely a question of correct valuation in the assessment of property subject to taxation, the taxpayer who is dissatisfied with the assessor's valuation of his property must rely upon his right to apply to the board of equalization for a proper reduction thereof, and that the decision of the board of equalization, within the limits of a reasonable discretion, after a due hearing upon such application, is final and conclusive. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation v. County of Los Angeles, 162 Cal. 164, 121 Pac. 384, 9 A. L. R. 1277; Birch v. Orange County (Cal. App.) 210 Pac. 57; Southern California Hardwood & Mfg. Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 49 Cal. App. 712, 194 Pac. 62. But appellant contends that the situation presented by the complaint in this case excludes it from the scope of those decisions, for the reason that, on account of the facts alleged, the assessment was illegal and void, in that, if the said debts and deductions had been allowed, there would have been no solvent credits to assess. He contends that by reason of this fact his right of action should be sustained, and that this contention is supported by the decision of the Supreme Court in Columbia Savings Bank v. County of Los Angeles, 137 Cal. 467, 70 Pac. 308.

[2, 3] We are of the opinion that the decision in the Columbia Savings Bank case is not applicable here. In that case the plaintiff in February purchased certain United States bonds which were exempt from taxation. In the following April it sold them. The assessor claimed that the bonds had been purchased with intent to evade taxation, and that for that reason he had a right to ignore the purchase and assess the money as if such purchase had not been made. The court found that the purchase had not been made with intent to evade taxation, and the right to recover the tax paid under protest was sustained. Referring to the contention of the county that the decision of the county board of equalization refusing to strike out of the assessment as made by the assessor the amount added by him to cover said investment in United States bonds was final and conclusive against the plaintiff, the court declared that this contention is unsound.

> "The taxpayer may have relief under the provisions of section 3819 of the Political Code, in cases where he claims the assessment, or any part of it, is void, by paying under protest the full amount of the tax as assessed, and within six months thereafter bringing an action to recover back such part of the tax paid as he claims to be void, as is done in this case."

Appellant herein cannot bring itself under the rule which applies to a void assessment by the mere statement in its complaint that the assessment is void, unless the facts alleged in support of that conclusion exhibit a void assessment. But in this case, on the contrary, we think that the facts stated in the complaint show nothing other than a claim based upon an alleged excessive valuation of the solvent credits owned by appellant. The nature of appellant's claim wherein it insists that the valuation should have been reduced to nothing is the same as if it had claimed that it should have been reduced to any other stated amount less than that shown by the valuation of the assessment. Appellant did have large solvent credits which primarily were subject to assessment, although in the valuation thereof it was entitled (on a proper application therefor) to a reduction measured by the amount of any debts due from it to bona fide residents of this state. Cal. Const. art. 13, § 1; Pol. Code, §§ 3628, 3629.

In Southern California Hardwood & Manufacturing Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 49 Cal. App. 712, 194 Pac. 62, the action was one to recover a tax paid on unsecured credits and solvent debts due from others, notwithstanding that the plaintiff claimed that its debts due to bona fide residents of the state were equal to said items of credits which it was proposed to assess. The assessor found and assessed a balance obtained by valuing the debts due to bona fide residents of this state at less than the valuation of the assessable assets of the plaintiff. Plaintiff did not make any objection or any application for a revaluation before the board of equalization, but paid the tax under protest and brought its action to recover. It was found by the court that the changes in the plaintiff's statement were made by the county assessor under a mistaken belief that the plaintiff was not entitled to the deduction claimed by it; that, in consequence of this mistake, the plaintiff's assessable properties were overvalued to the full extent of said assessment, and that in fact there was no balance of assessable assets upon which a tax should be levied. Nevertheless judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and this judgment was affirmed. It was held that "the result of this mistake amounted merely to an overvaluation of the plaintiff's properties, or—which amounted to the same thing in effect—an undervaluation of the appellant's deductible debts." It was further held that an overvaluation of assessable properties on the part of the assessor is not such an error as will entitle the owner of such properties to the remedy provided in section 3804 of the Political Code, "but, on the contrary, our attention has been called to a consistent line of decisions by the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal of this state, holding that the remedy of the property owner in the event of an overvaluation of his property by the assessor is by application to the board of supervisors of the county sitting as a board of equalization for a revaluation of his property."

Respondent further calls attention to the fact that the complaint in this action does not allege that the debts and liabilities by reason of which it claimed a deduction from its assessment were solely owing "to bona fide residents of the state of California." The claim made was and is that those debts and liabilities were owing "to bona fide residents of the state of California and firms, associates, and corporation doing business in said state." Said firms, associates, or corporations may have been resident outside of the state of California. In that event debts or liabilities owing to them could not be used in reduction of the assessment of solvent credits belonging to the plaintiff, unless, perhaps, such right might be established by proving that the debt was incurred in favor of a creditor who, though domiciled elsewhere, had established an independent "business domicile" (as it is sometimes called) in California. As to this possible exception, we express no opinion, merely noting that in Westinghouse, etc., Co. v. Los Angeles County (Cal. Sup.) 205 Pac. 1076, it was held that a Pennsylvania corporation, doing business in this state, did not subject its solvent credits (resulting from that business) to taxation here by transacting business through an agency established here, where such agency was not an independent business, nor an independent branch of the principal business of the corporation.

Respondent relies upon some other propositions to sustain the judgment, but we think it unnecessary to give them particular consideration at this time.

The judgment is affirmed.

GROSSMAN v. YIP WING et al. (Civ. 2544.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 5, 1923. Rehearing Denied June 4, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 3, 1923.)

1. Replevin 🔑86—Title to land cannot be litigated in action to recover growing crops as against one in adverse possession under claim of right.

Title to land cannot be litigated and adjudicated in a personal action, as claim and delivery, to recover growing crops or emblements, as against one actually seized or in possession in good faith under claim of right or color of title.

2. Crops 🔑2—Adverse possessor owns crops, whether severed from or attached to land.

Crops growing on land by one in adverse possession under a claim of right are his property, whether severed from or attached to the land.

3. Adverse possession 🔑70—"Color of title" defined.

"Color of title" means that which in appearance is title, but in fact is not a good title.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Color of Title.]

4. Crops 🔑2—One taking possession in good faith under lease from purported owner and holding adversely is owner of crop grown by him, even as against true owner of land.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 322, 323, one taking possession of land in good faith under a lease purporting to have been executed by one supporting his title by certain deeds, etc., or muniments of title, without knowledge that lessor's title was questioned or doubtful, and holding possession openly, notoriously, and in hostility to any other claimant, is the owner of crops grown thereon by him, even as against the true owner of the land.

5. Ejectment 🔑1—Use and occupation 🔑1—Remedy of owner of land, on which crop is grown by one in adverse possession, is in ejectment and to recover value of use and occupation.

The remedy of the true owner of land, on which a crop is grown by one in possession in good faith under a lease from one claiming title, is in an action in ejectment against such tenant and his lessor, and to recover, not the crop, but the value of the use and occupation of the land.

On Petition for Rehearing.

6. Appeal and error 🔑169—Point not made at trial not reviewed.

A point not made at the trial need not be reviewed.

7. Evidence 🔑69, 88—Property 🔑10—Tenants in possession presumed to have entered under lease, notwithstanding conflicting presumptions.

In claim and delivery for a crop by plaintiff claiming as owner against one who entered under lease from another, held that, in view of the presumptions under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 11, 19, 20, 33, that things possessed are owned by the possessor, that private transactions are fair and regular, that the ordinary course of business has been followed, and that the law had been obeyed, the presumption is that persons in possession of land leased to them entered thereon under the lease, though the day of the month in which it was executed was omitted and not shown by extrinsic evidence, and the lease was not acknowledged or recorded, and there was no positive testimony as to whether they entered under it or under prior parol authority from lessor; the presumption that it was executed on the last day of the month being inapplicable.

8. Crops 🔑2—One holding adversely under lease held entitled to potato crop, though he originally took possession without authority.

One in actual adverse possession under a lease from one claiming title, when an action in replevin was instituted, and potatoes grown by him seized, by one claiming to be the true owner, may recover the potatoes or the value thereof, though he originally took possession without authority from any one, and thereby became a trespasser as against either lessor or plaintiff.

9. Replevin 🔑72—Finding that land on which potatoes seized were grown was embraced in tract leased to defendant sustained.

In claim and delivery to recover a potato crop growing on land claimed by plaintiff, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that the land was embraced in a tract leased to defendants by one claiming title, notwithstanding the absence of direct or positive testimony to such effect; the burden being on plaintiff to rebut the presumption that such was the fact.

10. Replevin 🔑72—Growers of potato crop held not shown to have taken possession of land by force.

In claim and delivery to recover a potato crop grown on land claimed by plaintiff, evidence held not to show that defendants, holding adversely under a lease from one claiming title, took possession by force and violence.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by Leonard J. Grossman against Yip Wing and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, and Nat. A. Brown, of Stockton, for appellant.

Louttit & Stewart, of Stockton, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an action in claim and delivery, whereby the plaintiff demands the recovery of a certain crop of potatoes growing, at the time of the commencement of this action, on approximately 6 acres of land, situate on Mildred Island, San Joaquin county. It appears that the plaintiff, upon the issuance of summons in the action, which was commenced on September 12, 1921, claimed delivery of the potatoes to him (section 509, Code Civ. Proc.), and, in pursuance of sections 510, 511, and 512 of said Code, the same were seized and taken by the sheriff. It was stipulated that the quantity of potatoes taken from the ground by the sheriff under the writ of replevin consisted of 818 sacks, of the aggregate value of $1,249.66, and that of the 818 sacks so taken 370 sacks were sold by the plaintiff.

Plaintiff was at the several times referred to in the pleadings and the evidence a resident of the city of Atlanta, in the state of Georgia. On the 15th day of April, 1919, he duly appointed one Harry B. Barker, of the city of Gary, county of Lake, state of Indiana, his attorney in fact, with authority "to buy, lease, sell, mortgage, deed, take, convey in trust or otherwise, and to do all other things that I might do if personally present with regard to real property everywhere and likewise." This power, in short, is in all respects sufficient to vest Barker with the authority to carry on any transaction with regard to the real property of the plaintiff, wherever situated, that he himself could or might do. On the 4th day of December, 1918, one Joseph Basile, Jr., and Genevieve Basile, his wife, by a deed of said date, granted and conveyed to the plaintiff certain lands in San Joaquin county which comprised surveys Nos. 593, 628, 629, and 1184, swamp and overflowed lands, in township 2 north, range 4 east, Mt. Diablo meridian, which lands are described by metes and bounds in the instrument of conveyance. The plaintiff claims that these lands embrace all of said Mildred Island.

In the month of March, 1921, the defendant Seid Pak Yuen, under what purported to be a lease from one Joseph Pavliger and dated "March, 1921," the day of said month not appearing in the lease, entered into the possession of 110 acres of land situated on said Mildred Island. Said lease comprised four different parcels of land; the same having come down to Pavliger through one Louis Sanders from as many different grantors.

The amended complaint alleges that on or before the 8th day of March, 1921, plaintiff was the owner and in actual possession of the lands comprising the whole of Mildred Island, and that on the 8th day of March, 1921, the defendants entered upon the 6 acres in question "against the will and without the consent of plaintiff and without claim or color of title on the part of defendants or either of them; that thereafter defendants planted thereon a crop of potatoes, which is now in said ground and in a condition to be harvested"; that plaintiff is the owner of and entitled to the possession of all of said potatoes now growing on said tract of land, and that the same is wrongfully detained by the defendants.

The answer specifically denies the allegations of the amended complaint, and as an affirmative defense alleges that the 6 acres of land upon which the crop of potatoes was growing at the time said potatoes were seized under the writ of replevin were situated within the exterior lines of the 110 acres above referred to as being the property of Joseph Pavliger, and that the said Seid Pak Yuen entered into the possession of said 6 acres under the lease from Pavliger to him. There are two other special defenses set up in the answer of Seid Pak Yuen, but these are of no special consequence in the determination of the question presented here. The defendant Yip Wing filed a disclaimer, in which he declared that he has and claims no right, title, or interest in and to the real property in dispute.

The court found that the said defendant entered into and took possession of the 6 acres of land in question—

> "in good faith and as the tenant of one Joseph Pavliger, under a claim of right and color of title, and that he thereupon planted thereon a crop of potatoes, raised said crop of potatoes, and the same was in condition to be harvested at the time of the commencement of plaintiff's action on the 12th day of September, 1921, and that at the time of the commencement of plaintiff's action the defendant was, ever since has been, and he now is, in possession of said tract of 6 acres under a claim of right and color of title and in good faith and adverse to the claims of the plaintiff; * * * that the plaintiff is not, nor at the time of said seizure was, the owner of or entitled to the possession of all or any part of said 818 sacks of potatoes grown upon said tract"; and that "it is not true that the whole or any part of said potatoes is or was wrongfully detained by the defendants, or either of them, from the plaintiff."

The judgment was that the plaintiff return to the defendant said 818 sacks of potatoes or the value thereof, "and as said potatoes cannot be returned on account of sales made by the plaintiff, defendant Seid Pak Yuen is entitled to recover the value thereof, to wit, the sum of $1,249.66, together with interest on said sum of $1,249.66 from the 12th day of September, 1921." The appeal is by the plaintiff from said judgment.

The only evidence produced by the plaintiff in support of his claim of title to the land in dispute was the deed by Basile and his wife to him. The defendant introduced in evidence a number of deeds purporting to convey title to the 110 acres, of which the defendant Seid Pak Yuen claims to hold possession under the lease from Pavliger. These instruments purported to be conveyances of the four parcels constituting said 110 acres to the predecessors in title of Louis Sanders and conveyances to Louis Sanders. There was also introduced in evidence a letter referring to a contract of sale between the purported owner of one of the parcels constituting the 110 acres and Louis Sanders, whereby the former agreed to sell and the latter agreed to purchase said parcel of land for a certain specified amount, payable in certain specified monthly installments. The instruments so referred to constituted the only record evidence introduced by the defendant for the purpose of supporting the title of his lessor to the land in dispute.

It will be noted from the foregoing that neither the plaintiff nor the defendant deraigned title to the property in controversy from the paramount source of title. They did not connect their respective grantors with any prior title whatsoever. The court, if required to pass upon the question of title in this case, could not determine in whom the title to the 110 acres claimed by Pavliger, or, for that matter, title to any other part of Mildred Island, is vested.

As to the possession of Mildred Island by the plaintiff, the evidence was to the effect that the plaintiff's agent, said Barker, entered into possession of the island in the year 1920. The island at that time was entirely covered with water, and Barker, so he testified, proceeded with necessary steps for the reclamation of the island so as to put it in a condition for farming purposes. He stated that his operations extended over the entire island, including the 6 acres in dispute. He said:

> "We protected the banks with piling, built levees with dredgers, dug ditches, and cleaned out and ran canals. We worked on the entire island. During the year 1920 we were the only people on the island."

Referring to the fact that the defendant was in the occupation of a portion of the lands claimed by the plaintiff, he testified:

> "Around the 8th of March, 1921, I heard that the Chinamen, these people we have the suit with, were on the island. I immediately hired a speed boat, and in company with Kelly, the operator of the boat, went to the place where the Chinamen were on the island. There were several Chinamen there together on the levee, and I went up to them and asked who was in charge, and defendant Frank Yip, or Young Yip, said he was. I told him that they, the Chinamen, had no right on the island and ordered him off."

He further stated that in reply "Frank Yip," as the witness named him, called him an opprobrious name and ordered him "to get off or he would kill me. At that time," proceeded the witness, "there were four or five Chinamen present with him, and I noticed a couple of shotguns on the premises; one lying on the ground and one leaning against the shed. When the Chinamen threatened to kill me I left the island and returned to Stockton. These Chinamen remained in possession of certain portions of the island. I never gave them permission to remain, and they have remained against my will. They planted a crop of potatoes, and this crop is still in the ground and was at the time of the commencement of this action."

As to the exact location of the 6 acres of land in dispute, the evidence appears to be rather vague and uncertain. There were two witnesses, civil engineers by profession, who testified that the deeds and contract whereby Louis Sanders became the owner of the four parcels of land above referred to, and which are relied upon by the defendants as constituting color of title in him, described the lands sufficiently to enable them to be identified as the lands constituting the 110 acres within the exterior boundaries of which it is claimed the 6 acres in question are embraced. There was some other testimony regarding the location of said 6 acres and which tended to locate them within the boundaries of the 110 acres. The trial court, while declaring in a written opinion, filed in the case and which is incorporated in the brief of counsel for the defendant, that the 6 acres were not located with absolute clearness, nevertheless held that there was sufficient testimony to warrant it in concluding that said 6 acres was a narrow strip overlapping the four parcels described in the instruments purporting to convey the 110 acres to the defendant's lessor. We are satisfied that the court was justified in reaching this conclusion and making its finding as to that matter accordingly.

We may assume that the plaintiff's testimony, as above related, taken without regard to any adverse showing, is sufficient to show that the plaintiff was, through his attorney in fact, in actual possession of the entire island. It also must be conceded that actual possession of property is good as against a stranger or a trespasser, that is, one who is a mere intruder or "squatter," and not holding possession adversely in good faith under claim of right or color of title.

[1] Plaintiff, however, attempted to support his right to the recovery of the crop of potatoes upon the theory that he is the owner and entitled to the possession of the 6 acres of land upon which the potatoes were grown and that the defendant was a trespasser and in occupation of said land without any right whatsoever. This cannot be done as against one in possession of the premises under a claim of right; for it is well settled in this state that the question of title cannot be litigated and adjudicated in a personal action to recover the crops or emblements growing upon land as against the party who is actually seized or in possession of such land in good faith and under claim of right or color of title. Halleck v. Mixer, 16 Cal. 579; Kimball v. Lohmas, 31 Cal. 154; Page v. Fowler, 39 Cal. 415, 2 Am. Rep. 462; Pennybecker v. McDougal, 46 Cal. 661; Martin v. Thompson, 62 Cal. 618, 45 Am. Rep. 663; Smith v. Cunningham, 67 Cal. 262, 7 Pac.

679; Wilson v. Atkinson, 77 Cal. 485, 20 Pac. 66, 11 Am. St. Rep. 299; Emerson v. Whitaker, 83 Cal. 147, 23 Pac. 285; Groome v. Almstead, 101 Cal. 425, 35 Pac. 1021; Johnston v. Fish, 105 Cal. 420, 38 Pac. 979, 45 Am. St. Rep. 53; Hines v. Good, 128 Cal. 38, 60 Pac. 527, 79 Am. St. Rep. 22. In Halleck v. Mixer, Judge Field states the rule as follows, quoting from the syllabi:

> "In suits for timber cut and removed, as in this case, the true rule, so far as the title to the land is concerned, is this: The plaintiff out of possession cannot sue for the property severed from the freehold, when the defendant is in possession of the premises from which the property was severed, holding them adversely, in good faith, under claim and color of title. In other words, the personal action cannot be made the means of litigating and determining the title to real property as between conflicting claimants."

The above rule has been uniformly followed in California, and is expounded and applied in the cases above mentioned in connection with the case of Halleck v. Mixer, supra.

[2, 3] We are satisfied that where one is in possession of land under a claim of right, holding the same adversely to all others, the crops grown by him on the land so held, whether severed from the land or still attached thereto, are his property. In this case the plaintiff, as the purported owner of the land, was not dealing with a trespasser, since the record clearly shows that Seid Pak Yuen entered into, took possession of, and occupied the premises in controversy in good faith under a claim of right and adversely to all other persons claiming any interest in said premises. Color of title means that which in appearance is title, but in fact is not a good title. U. S. v. Casterlin (C. C.) 164 Fed. 437, 439; Whitney Lumber & Grain Co. v. Crabtree, 166 Fed. 738, 740, 92 C. C. A. 400; Knight v. Grim, 110 Va. 400, 66 S. E. 42, 43, 19 Ann. Cas. 400; Montoya v. Unknown Heirs of Vigil, 16 N. M. 349, 120 Pac. 676, 688.

[4] Under section 322 of our Code of Civil Procedure land is deemed to be held adversely, except in certain particulars not material here—

> "when it appears that the occupant or those under whom he claims, entered into the possession of the property under claim of title, exclusive of other right, founding such claim upon a written instrument, as being a conveyance of the property in question, or upon the decree or judgment of a competent court, and that there has been a continued occupation and possession of the property included in such instrument, decree, or judgment, or of some part of the property under such claim."

And section 323 of said Code provides that—

> "For the purpose of constituting an adverse possession" by a person claiming under such deed or judgment, the "land is deemed to have been possessed and occupied * * * where it has been usually cultivated or improved, or "where, although not inclosed, it has been used for the supply of fuel, or of fencing timber for the purpose of husbandry, or for pasturage, or for the ordinary use of the occupant."

See Owsley v. Matson, 156 Cal. 401, 403, 104 Pac. 983; wherein is cited the case of Wilson v. Atkinson, 77 Cal. 485, 20 Pac. 66, 11 Am. St. Rep. 299, supra.

It has even been held that—

> "A tax deed, though void on its face, if containing a proper description of the land, is sufficient to give color of title, under which a claimant of title in good faith may found an adverse possession, so as to set the statutes of limitations in motion. It is a written instrument, upon which a claim of title may be founded as being a conveyance of the property in question, within the meaning of section 322 of the Civil Code, and is effective as notice of the extent of the possession and claim under it." Wilson v. Atkinson, supra.

In the last-mentioned case it is further said, quoting from the syllabi:

> "In order to begin an adverse possession under a claim of title, within the meaning of section 322 of the Civil Code, the adverse occupant must enter and hold the land in good faith, believing his conveyance to be valid. Knowledge that the instrument is absolutely void will vitiate the claim of title; but such knowledge must be actual, and not such as would arise from the legal construction of the instrument."

In this case, as we have seen, the defendant Seid Pak Yuen entered into the possession of the premises in dispute under a lease purporting to have been executed by a party who supported his title to the property by certain deeds, etc., or muniments of title. The possession of the defendant was open and notorious and hostile to that of any other claimant of the property. There is nothing in the record indicating that the defendant did not enter into the possession of said premises in good faith, believing that his lease from Pavliger vested in him the legal right to take and hold such possession. In other words, there is absolutely no evidence in the record tending in any degree to show that Seid Pak Yuen, when taking the lease from Pavliger and entering into the possession of the land described in said instrument, had any knowledge of the fact, if it was a fact, that Pavliger's title to said land was questioned or of doubtful validity.

[5] Conceding, then, that the plaintiff is the true owner of all of Mildred Island, including the premises in dispute, the defendant, being in possession of said land under a claim of right and color of title, was, under the authorities above cited, the owner of the crop of potatoes involved herein. The situation here, as it is presented by the record, is simply this: That neither the plaintiff nor the defendant succeeded in establishing title to the land in dispute. But the defendant proved actual possession under a claim of right, and as against such possession the plaintiff has no standing in an action to recover any crops produced by the defendant upon said premises. If the plaintiff is the true owner of all of Mildred Island, including the land in controversy, his remedy as against the defendant and his lessor is in an action in ejectment and for the recovery of the value of the use and occupation of the land.

On Petition for a Rehearing.

HART, J. There are two points upon which the application for a rehearing is pressed, to wit: (1) That the evidence fails to show that the defendants entered upon and took possession of the premises in dispute under the written lease from Pavliger to Seid Pak Yuen; (2) that the defendants failed to show, and there is no evidence that does show, that the 6 acres upon which the potatoes were planted and grown are embraced within the 110 acres of which Pavliger claims the ownership and which is described in the lease from said Pavliger to Seid Pak Yuen.

[6] 1. The point first above stated was not made at the trial of the case, but is raised for the first time on this appeal. For that reason we would be justified in refusing to review the point. The case was tried in the court below upon the theory that the defendants went into possession of the premises under the written lease from Pavliger to Seid Pak Yuen. The point should have been raised or made at the trial, so that the defendants could have been given an opportunity to show, as in all probability they could have shown, that they took possession under said lease.

[7] But we will consider briefly the contention of counsel as to this point. Counsel first call attention to the fact that the lease from Pavliger to Seid Pak Yuen does not indicate the exact date of its execution. The lease bears the following date, "March——, 1921," the day on which the instrument was executed being pretermitted. There was no showing, or any attempt to show, by parol or other means extrinsic to the lease itself, what day the writing was executed. It was not acknowledged nor therefore was it recorded. Nor is there any positive testimony as to whether the defendant entered into the possession of the property under said lease, or entered under parol authority from Pavliger prior to the making of the written lease. From these considerations it is argued in the petition that the presumption following from the fact of the omission from the date of the lease the day of its execution, and the failure otherwise to show the day upon which the writing was executed, is that the instrument was executed on the last day of the month in which it is thereby shown that the writing was made and entered into by and between the parties. According to this theory, the lease in question was executed on the 31st day of March, 1921, or a trifle over three weeks after the defendants were found in occupancy of the premises in dispute. In support of this contention, counsel cite Jones on Evidence, § 19, and Graves v. Lebanon National Bank, 10 Bush (Ky.) 23, 19 Am. Rep. 50, 57. Upon all these considerations it is argued that it must be assumed that the defendants in the first instance took possession of the premises without authority from any person; that they were therefore trespassers; and that, as is at least the necessary effect of the argument, they continued as such trespassers, notwithstanding that subsequently to their entry upon the premises they were given a lease of the same by one claiming to be the owner.

We do not think that the presumption invoked and sought to be applied here by counsel for the appellant is applicable to this case. We are of the opinion rather that the presumption should be, and is, that the defendants entered upon and took possession of the premises under the lease. We cannot conceive how it may logically be maintained that a presumption of doing wrong is to follow from facts from which it is naturally to be inferred that a party did right. Here, as seen, the defendant Seid Pak Yuen had written evidence of the right to take possession of said property in the month of March, 1921, and it would seem absurd to say that, rather than to indulge the presumption that he took possession of the property under said authority, it must be presumed that he took possession wrongfully. There are several presumptions of law, disputable, of course, which we think apply to the case here. Subdivision 19 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that private transactions are presumed to have been fair and regular. Subdivision 33 of the same section provides that it is to be presumed that the law has been obeyed, and subdivision 11 of the same section declares "that things which a person possesses are owned by him." Another presumption applicable here is that stated in subdivision 20 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure as follows: "That the ordinary course of business has been followed." From these views it follows that, if the point were of any importance whatsoever in the decision of this case, it was the duty of the plaintiff to have overcome the presumption that the taking of possession of the premises by the defendants was under the lease by proof that such taking of possession was neither under said lease nor by the sanction or authority of Pavliger.

[8] But the point, in our opinion, is of no significance or importance in the determination of the appeal herein; for if it were true that Seid Pak Yuen originally took possession of the lands without authority from any one, and that thus for the time he became a trespasser as against the rights either of Pavliger or the plaintiff, yet, at the time this action was instituted (September 12, 1921), and the potatoes were seized by the plaintiff under the writ of replevin thereupon issued, Seid Pak Yuen was unquestionably in actual adverse possession of the premises and holding the same under a lease from one claiming title to the premises, and therefore held such possession under color of title and claim of right. The case of Page v. Fowler, 39 Cal. 415, 2 Am. Rep. 462, cited in the original opinion, and which has been sustained by all the subsequent cases in this state, is, in its general facts, quite similar to the case at bar. Indeed, we perceive no distinction between the two cases as to the general facts, which justifies the conclusion that the principles upon which Page v. Fowler, was decided are less applicable to this case than that. See, also, Rector v. Lewis, 46 Cal. App. 168, 188 Pac. 1018.

[9] 2. Further examination of the evidence since the filing of the petition for rehearing has added strength to the view, expressed in the original opinion, that the finding that the 6 acres upon which the potatoes were planted and grown were embraced within the exterior boundaries of the 110 acres described in the lease from Pavliger to Seid Pak Yuen cannot justly be disturbed. There was introduced in evidence a plat or a map of the island, which shows swamp land surveys of numerous tracts of land embraced within the island. Said tracts are delineated and so identified on said map by metes and bounds. Included within the lands so delineated are the four several tracts comprising the 110 acres described in said lease. The three deeds purporting to vest in Pavliger three of the four parcels of which the 110 acres consist and a contract of sale between Pavliger and the purported owner of the fourth parcel, purporting to vest title to said parcel in Pavliger, correspond, in the description of said parcels, to the description of the same upon said map, as does also the lease from Pavliger to Seid Pak Yuen. As shown in the original opinion, two civil engineers, who had made surveys of the island, including the 110 acres, testified that the lands leased to Seid Pak Yuen were capable of ready identification by a reference to the plat or map referred to. One of the engineers, Widdows, stated that said map follows the description (in distances and acres) contained in the Pavliger lease to Seid Pak Yuen as to the several parcels constituting the 110 acres claimed by Pavliger. It is true that there is no direct or positive testimony that the 6 acres planted to potatoes were embraced within the 110 acres, but, since Seid Pak Yuen had a lease of the 110 acres, it is to be presumed that he took possession of the leased lands and that the 6 acres planted to potatoes were embraced within the lands which under the lease he had the right to take possession of. The burden therefore rested with the plaintiff to show, if it were a fact, that the 6 acres were not embraced within the 110 acres which are described in the lease from Pavliger to Seid Pak Yuen. The plaintiff made no effort at the trial to show that the 6 acres were not situated within the exterior boundaries of the 110 acres described in the said lease.

[10] In conclusion, we may observe that the statement in the petition that Seid Pak Yuen and the other Chinese who were with him upon the premises took possession thereof by means of force and violence is wholly without warrant in the evidence. The only evidence in the record showing the manner in which the defendants had possession of the premises on the 8th day of March, 1921, consisted of the testimony of Barker, the agent of the plaintiff. The substance of all that he testified to as to his visit to the camp of the Chinese on March 8th is set forth in the original opinion; and it will be noted therefrom that all that it amounted to was that, having previously heard that the Chinese were occuping certain portions of the island, he, accompanied by a man by the name of Kelly, went to the camp of the Chinese and said to them that they had no right there and ordered them to vacate the premises; that one of the Chinese (not Seid Pak Yuen) replied in foul language, called Barker a harsh name, and threatened to kill him if he did not leave the premises. It will be noticed that Barker did not even tell the Chinese that he or the plaintiff was the owner or entitled to the possession of the premises or that either claimed such ownership or right of possession. He simply ordered them away from the land.

However, for the reasons stated in the original opinion and those superadded herein, the petition for a rehearing is denied.

TITLE GUARANTEE & TRUST CO. v. HAMMOND LUMBER CO.

(Civ. 2570.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 21, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court. July 19, 1923.)

1. Mortgages 🔑280(5)—Findings that defendant in suit for deficiency did not assume mortgage debt sustained by evidence.

In a mortgagee's action to recover a deficiency judgment after foreclosure, evidence held to sustain findings that defendant did not assume the mortgage debt.

2. Corporations 🔑397—When corporation bound by act of officers or employees stated.

A corporation is not bound by any acts of its officers or employees unless they are by the corporation vested with general authority to transact any and all of the business falling within the scope of its corporate purposes, or vested with special authority, through formal action of its board of directors, to do some particular act within the limit of its charter powers, or unless the corporation has held such officers or employees out to the public as possessing authority to act for it according to the general usage, practice, and course of its business.

3. Principal and agent 🔑117(4)—Authority of agent to make trust deed must be in writing.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 2309, 2933, the authority of an agent to make a trust deed given as a pledge for the payment of money must be in writing.

4. Corporations 🔑432(12)—Finding that corporation had not given sufficient authority to employee to execute mortgage sustained.

In an action by mortgagee for a deficiency against a corporation alleged in fact to be the mortgagor and giving the mortgage in the name of one of its employees, evidence held insufficient to show a sufficient authority conferred upon its employees by the corporation to execute the mortgage upon the foreclosure of which the deficiency arose.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, as executor of the last will and testament of John S. Maltman, deceased, against the Hammond Lumber Company, to recover a deficiency judgment. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John F. Keogh and C. C. Mishler, both of Los Angeles, and Frank H. Snyder, of Glendale, for appellant.

R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HART, J. Since the appeal herein was taken, the original plaintiff and appellant John S. Maltman, passed out of this life, testate, and the above-named corporation, having previously been regularly appointed executor of the last will of the deceased, was thereafter duly substituted as party plaintiff and appellant in the place and stead of said John S. Maltman.

The action is to recover from the defendant a sum of money equal to an alleged deficiency following from the difference between the sum for which a certain promissory note is alleged to have been made and given by defendant to said Maltman and the sum for which certain real property in Los Angeles county was sold by the trustee under a deed of trust, given to secure said note, for the purpose of satisfying the obligation.

Judgment passed to the defendant, and an appeal from said judgment is brought here upon a bill of exceptions.

The principal question presented for decision here is whether the findings derive sufficient evidentiary support.

The facts, as they are alleged in the complaint, may thus be stated: The real property to which the trust deed to secure the payment of the promissory note referred to was made and given consists of lots 22, 23, and 24, in block 8, of Park tract, in the county of Los Angeles. On the 26th day of March, 1913, Walter E. Martin and his wife were the owners of these lots, and on the date first mentioned they executed to John S. Maltman, the original appellant herein, a mortgage covering said property to secure the payment of their promissory note to said Maltman for the sum of $9,000, to mature at the expiration of two years from the date of said note. Said note called for interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly, in default of which payment the interest thus accrued to be added to the principal and draw like interest. It was also provided in said note:

> That, in the event default be made in the payment of any installment of interest when due, then the whole sum of principal and interest "shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of this note."

On the 20th day of November, 1914, Maltman brought suit in the superior court of Los Angeles county to foreclose said mortgage against said real property. In addition to the lien of the mortgage, there also subsisted against said property, at the time of the conveyance hereinafter to be referred to, an assessment lien in the sum of $2,866.56 and interest thereon; said lien arising by reason of the improvement of the street upon which the property abutted. On June 1, 1915, Maltman dismissed said foreclosure suit and satisfied the liens subsisting against the same in consideration of a promise by the defendant, through one of its employees named O'Malley, that it (defendant) would give to Maltman its promissory note in a sum equal in amount to the mortgage indebtedness and the assessment lien and execute a trust deed as security for the payment of said note. That, agreeably to this arrangement, the property was conveyed to one W. H. Elliott, who in turn gave plaintiff his promissory note for the sum of $12,641.79, and at the same time executed and delivered to the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, a corporation, as trustee, a trust deed to secure the payment of said note. That said Elliott was an employee of the defendant, and was in said transaction authorized to act for and did act for the defendant. On March 19, 1917, the defendant caused said Elliott, his wife joining, to convey the said property to H. W. McLeod, who was, at the time of said conveyance, and for some time previously had been, the manager of defendant's business affairs in the city of Los Angeles. That said McLeod took said conveyance for and in behalf of the defendant, and that he was then duly authorized by the defendant so to do.

Prior to February 7, 1919, said note became due and payable, and on said date, while the obligation still remained unsatisfied, the following proposal in writing, purporting to be signed by the defendant through H. W. McLeod, its manager, was addressed to and in due time received by Maltman:

"February 7, 1919.

"Mr. John S. Maltman, Los Angeles, California—Dear Sir: We hold title to lots 22, 23, and 24 in block 8 of the Park tract on Sunset boulevard, on which you hold a trust deed in the amount of $12,641.79, together with accrued interest. If you will allow a new one-year trust deed to be issued to be signed by C. L. Van Deventer in the amount of $11,000 at 7 per cent., we will agree to pay down to that amount together with all accrued interest and taxes. We are to be the owners of the equity in this property.

"Yours very truly,
"Hammond Lumber Company,
"By H. W. McLeod, Manager."

At the end of the above writing, and upon the same sheet of paper, were the following words and figures:

"Accepted: John S. Maltman, 2/8/19.

"Rec'd of Hammond Lumber Company two thousand two hundred seven 98/100 dollars reducing the above-mentioned indebtedness to eleven thousand dollars as of Jan. 7th, 1919.
"John S. Maltman."

In pursuance of the above-alleged proposal by defendant, through said McLeod, and acceptance thereof by Maltman, defendant caused said McLeod to convey said real property to one C. L. Van Deventer, alleged to be an employee of defendant, he (Van Deventer) having taken said conveyance for and in behalf of defendant and authorized by the latter so to do. That "defendant rendered the entire consideration for said conveyance, and that none of the consideration therefor was rendered by the said Van Deventer." Subsequently, and on January 24, 1919, defendant, in the name of C. L. Van Deventer, executed to Maltman a promissory note for the sum of $11,000, payable one year after date, and, as security for the payment of the same, Van Deventer executed a trust deed to the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, as trustee, to the said real property. All these last-mentioned transactions were, it is alleged, carried out for and in behalf of defendant and in pursuance of the proposal and acceptance thereof above quoted herein.

On August 2, 1919, the second quarterly installment of interest on the Van Deventer note having previously fallen due, Maltman, on July 24, 1919, at which time said installment of interest remained unpaid, as were also the taxes on said property for the years 1918–1919, exercised his election, as provided in the note for such defaults, to declare the whole sum of the principal and accrued interest to be due and payable, and caused a notice of said default by the defendant and election by him to be recorded, on August 5, 1919, in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county. On the same day, Maltman duly requested the trustee under the said deed of trust to proceed with the sale of said property in accordance with the terms of said deed and as in such cases required by law.

On December 6, 1919, the said trustee duly and regularly exposed said property for sale at public auction, and Maltman submitted at said sale a bid therefor in the sum of $5,000. Said bid being the highest offer made for said property at said sale, the same was "struck off" and sold to Maltman for said sum. Deducting the sum of $320.80 which was expended as costs or expenses for conducting the sale, the balance remaining and credited upon the note was the sum of $4,679.20. The demand is for the sum of $6,320.80, which included said costs and also the taxes for 1918–1919 in the sum of $68.90.

As stated at the beginning hereof, the above statement is gleaned from the complaint.

The defendant, answering the complaint, specifically denies every material allegation thereof except the allegations contained in paragraphs 13 and 14 thereof, as to which he declares that it has no information or belief sufficient to answer the same, "and basing its denial upon that ground, denies each and every allegation in said paragraphs contained." (These paragraphs of the complaint contain allegations as to the falling due of an installment of interest on the principal sum, the failure of the defendant to pay the same and the election of the plaintiff to exercise his option to declare the whole sum of principal and interest of the note then due and payable and also the allegations as to the sale by the trustee under the trust deed given to secure said note of said real property and the result of said sale, etc.)

The answer also sets up a special defense based upon the letter purporting to have been addressed to the plaintiff by the defendant. through "H. W. McLeod, manager," under date of February 7, 1919, and above referred to. As to this letter and the acceptance by Maltman annexed thereto, the answer alleges "that at the time said letter was so signed it was stated to the said plaintiff that the said defendant declined and refused to sign any promissory note or trust deed or agreement of any kind or character that would render it liable for the payment of any sum or amount to the said plaintiff whatsoever, and said defendant has not at any time agreed to pay to the said plaintiff any sum mentioned in any promissory note or trust deed, or any sum whatsoever."

The findings are in accord with the denials of the answer and are, in the main, in the negative form. In substance they are as follows: That the defendant did not, on August 15, 1915, or at any time, own the real property involved herein or take title thereto in the name of W. H. Elliott or any other person; that said Elliott was not at the time mentioned, or at any time, acting for or on behalf of the defendant, nor was he authorized by the defendant so to do; that, while not taking title to the property through said Elliott on the date mentioned, it nevertheless rendered the consideration for the conveyance to Elliott; that the plaintiff did not dismiss the foreclosure suit in consideration of a promise by the defendant that it would execute in favor of plaintiff its promissory note equal to the amount of the mortgage indebtedness and a street assessment lien then existing against the property and also execute a deed of trust to said or any real property to secure the payment of said note; that, while it is true that the defendant did, on the 7th of June, 1915, dismiss said foreclosure suit and paid and satisfied said street assessment and said mortgage upon said property, yet H. F. O'Malley, although an employee of the defendant, did not promise, nor was he duly authorized to promise, for and on behalf of the defendant, that the defendant would execute a note and trust deed, on consideration of the dismissal of said foreclosure suit, etc., nor was any other person or employee of the defendant authorized to make any such promise in consideration of the dismissal of said suit and the payment of said mortgage and assessment; that on March 19, 1917, the defendant did cause said Elliott and his wife to convey said real property to H. W. McLeod, and said McLeod did take said conveyance for and on behalf of the defendant, and he was then and there, and at said time, duly authorized and nominated by defendant so to do; that the defendant did not, on February 7, 1919, at which time said note became due and was unpaid, propose in writing to the plaintiff that if the latter would extend the time of payment of $11,000 of the indebtedness, so due and unpaid, it would reduce its indebtedness to said amount, nor that it would execute its promissory note in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $11,000, or any sum. and would secure the same by a trust deed upon said property, but that upon said date said defendant made its certain proposal in writing to said plaintiff "which said writing is set forth in defendant's special defense in its answer to plaintiff's complaint, and which said written proposal was accepted by said plaintiff on the 8th day of February, 1919;" that on February 10, 1919, the defendant caused said McLeod to convey said real property to C. L. Van Deventer; that the latter was an employee of defendant and did not take said conveyance on behalf of defendant, "but he was then and there agreed upon between the plaintiff and the defendant to act as a dummy in said transaction, and did act as a dummy, with the express purpose of relieving defendant from any obligation on said note or trust deed upon a consideration paid for that purpose by the defendant; that the promissory note executed by said Van Deventer in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $11,000 and the trust deed to said real property executed to the Title Guarantee & Trust Company to secure the payment of said note were not made and executed for or on behalf of the defendant or by its authority, nor was there any promise made by the defendant that it would pay to the plaintiff the sum of $11,000 as evidenced by said note, nor were said note and mortgage executed by the said Van Deventer upon any promise made by the defendant either on January 24, 1919, or at any other time that it would pay said note. The fact of the exercise by the plaintiff of his option to declare the whole of the principal sum of said note due and payable upon default in the payment of the quarterly installment of interest and that the defendant caused a notice of the said default to be recorded on August 5, 1919, in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county, and the further fact that the property was, upon request by plaintiff, exposed for sale at public auction, that the same was bid in by the plaintiff for the sum of $5,000 and that the costs and expenses for conducting said sale amounted to the sum of $320.80 which sum was paid by the plaintiff, leaving a balance of $4,679.20 to be credited upon said promissory note, were found to be true.

[1] The whole transaction involved herein, so far as is concerned the part taken therein by the defendant and its employees, if, indeed, we may assume that the defendant, as a matter of fact, did itself take a part or hand therein, seems to be shrouded in more or less of a mystery. If, as the court found to be true, the defendant did not at any time own the property in question or own any interest of any kind or nature therein, then it is strange that the defendant, as the court also found was so, should have rendered the consideration for the transfer of the property by the plaintiff to Elliott, one of its employees. If the defendant at no time owned any interest in the property, it is also strikingly singular that it should have required Elliott to transfer the property to McLeod, its manager. These observations, however, are not decisive of this case, nor are the circumstances which inspire their utterance of any consequence in the decision of the ultimate question presented by this appeal, to wit, whether there is evidence sufficient to support the findings essential to the upholding of the judgment; and we may as well here declare our opinion to be that such findings are sufficiently fortified, evidentially, and that they in turn support the judgment.

The testimony of Maltman is in substantial accord with and supports the averments of the complaint, except as to any facts contained in that pleading which may be regarded or construed as sufficiently setting up an estoppel against the right of the defendant to interpose the plea that the note in suit was not its obligation. And, as to this proposition, it is to be foretold that, conceding that the circumstances under which the complaint declares that the foreclosure suit was dismissed are sufficient to raise such estoppel, even Maltman's own testimony (and his is all the oral testimony presented in support of the complaint) signally fails to support the averments of his pleading in that respect.

Maltman testified that at some time in the year 1915 O'Malley, one of the defendant's employees, called to see him at his office in Los Angeles; that O'Malley said to him that he was an employee of the defendant; that he was negotiating at that time to obtain the title to certain property on which he (Maltman) had a mortgage (being the lots described in the complaint), and that negotiations were pending for securing title to said property by the defendant; that "he understood that I had a mortgage on the property and a suit pending to foreclose the mortgage. He asked whether I would be willing to dismiss the action and have the Hammond Lumber Company assume the debt." Maltman stated that O'Malley a short time thereafter again called on him and urged him to accept the defendant's proposition that it assume the mortgage debt. O'Malley's proposition to Maltman, so the latter stated, was that the defendant would give him a trust deed and note for the entire amount of the principal and interest and also an assessment of over $2,600 that Maltman had paid for street improvement and back taxes and attorneys' fees in his foreclosure suit. O'Malley, proceeded Maltman, said that the defendant would require the dismissal of the foreclosure suit "and that by taking the Hammond Lumber Company I would be getting a responsible party instead of an irresponsible one. I said, in substance, that I would accept the proposition. The matter was placed in escrow; during the time it was in escrow, I learned that one Elliott was to take the title for the Hammond Lumber Company. I called down to the Hammond Lumber Company yard on Alameda street, where I met Mr. Elliott and some members of the company, among whom were Mr. McLeod, the manager, and Mr. O'Malley. They told me, at that time, that Mr. Elliott was an employee of the company. That was in August, 1915, I think, prior to the closing of the escrow. Mr. O'Malley, Mr. McLeod, and Mr. Elliott were the parties present. It was stated to me there that Mr. Elliott was taking the title of this property for the Hammond Lumber Company as a convenience for the company. I said I wanted to know why Elliott was taking the title and not the lumber company. Afterwards the first note and trust deed (the Elliott note and trust deed) was delivered to me."

The above is all the testimony presented by the plaintiff as to the circumstances leading to the dismissal of the foreclosure suit, the conveyance of the property to Elliott, and the latter's execution of a promissory note in favor of the plaintiff for the indebtedness subsisting against the property when the foreclosure suit was dismissed and the execution of a trust deed to secure said note; and it is thus to be observed that it was not shown that the taking over of the property by Elliott and the execution of the note and trust deed by him were authorized by the defendant. There is no evidence in this record disclosing the extent of the authority of the manager of the corporation, nor is there any evidence showing that the board of directors of the defendant corporation formally or otherwise conferred authority upon its manager or its employees, named in connection with the transaction here, to do any act or acts looking to the sale or transfer or acquisition of the property in question, or that its manager or any of its other employees herein named was held out by it as possessing authority to transact for and on its behalf the business of buying real estate. Indeed, conceding that the defendant was a party to the several transactions relating to the real property in question, it is not made to appear that said transactions were within the sphere of its corporate authority or purposes. There is no writing of any character purporting to involve an authorization by the defendant of the Elliott transaction, or, for that matter, of any of the transactions carried out in connection with the real property in question.

[2, 3] It is well settled that a corporation is not bound by any act or acts of its officers or employees unless they are by the corporation vested with general authority to transact any and all of the business falling within the scope of its corporate purposes, or vested with special authority, through formal action of its board of directors, to do some particular act within the limits of its charter powers, or unless the corporation has held such officers or employees out to the public as possessing authority to act for it according to the general usage, practice, and course of its business. Blood v. Marcuse, 38 Cal. 594, 99 Am. Dec. 435; Cal. Winemakers' Corp. v. Sciaroni, 139 Cal. 277, 280, 72 Pac. 990; see, also, on the general subject of the extent of the authority of the manager or the president of a corporation to transact its usual or ordinary business without formal specific action of the board of directors in that regard, Stevens v. Selma Fruit Co., 18 Cal. App. 250, 251, 123 Pac. 212. More important still, however, as applicable to this case, is the rule that the authority of an agent to make any mortgage for his principal (and a trust deed given as a pledge for the payment of money is in legal effect a mortgage) must be in writing. Civ. Code, §§ 2309 and 2933; Blood v. La Serena, etc., Co., 113 Cal. 221, 229, 41 Pac. 1017, 45 Pac. 252; Curtin v. Salmon River, etc., Co., 141 Cal. 309, 311, 74 Pac. 851, 99 Am. St. Rep. 75.

It may here be added that there is no evidence that the defendant at any time ratified or in any manner sanctioned whatever acts were done by its manager or the other employees with reference to said property.

Nor is there any element of estoppel disclosed here, even if it were necessary to concede that the facts stated in the complaint are sufficient to present that issue. The only ground for an estoppel as against the defendant which could have arisen would have been in the fact of its alleged promise to take the property and give its promissory note to the plaintiff for a sum equal to the amount of the aggregate indebtedness subsisting against the property and the giving of the trust deed to secure the same upon the dismissal by plaintiff of the foreclosure suit. But the answer to any claim of an estoppel is to be found in what has been said above, to wit: That there was no competent evidence showing that the defendant itself ever made such promise or had any transaction with plaintiff in regard to the property or that it authorized its manager or any of its employees to enter into or carry out for it any negotiations with reference to said property.

The finding that no part of the consideration for the transfer or conveyance of the property to Elliott "was rendered by said Elliott, but by the defendant," is, so far as we are able to judge from this record, unintelligible. The said finding is a part of the finding that the defendant never at any time became the owner of the lots in question or took title thereto in the name of W. H. Elliott, or any other person, and that neither Elliott nor any other person at any time acted in the matter of the transfer of the property to any person for or on behalf of the defendant. But whether a consideration passed to plaintiff for the conveyance of the lots to Elliott, other than the consideration for which the plaintiff dismissed the foreclosure suit—that is, the alleged proposition of the defendant to purchase the property and to assume the indebtedness for which it had been pledged to the plaintiff by the Martins—is of no material importance in the decision of this case, since the plaintiff testified (and there is no evidence contrary to his testimony as to this matter) that he did not hear of Elliott's connection with the transaction until approximately a month after the foreclosure suit had been dismissed and "the matter had been put in escrow," pending the completion by the defendant of its alleged part of the agreement with regard to the property. Thus it would appear that the transfer of the property to Elliott was not, so far as the plaintiff was advised, a part of the transaction resulting in the dismissal by him of the foreclosure suit.

[4] We now come to the matter of the transfer of the land to Van Deventer, a consideration which is itself really decisive of this case. Raymond Johnson testified that he was an employee of the defendant in the months of January and February, 1919; that Maltman came to his office in the month of January, 1919, and opened up the discussion of the matter of the property in question and asked the witness if the defendant intended to pay the note executed by Van Deventer, to which the witness replied in the negative. Maltman said that he would not want the full amount but would like to have $10,000 of the indebtedness paid, and said that the defendant "was responsible for the indebtedness, and I told him if we were it would have been paid before now." A few days thereafter, so Johnson proceeded, Maltman again called on him, and the witness stated to him that he (witness) had talked with those in authority over the defendant, and that they said that they would not be responsible for the Van Deventer note. Thereupon Maltman asked the witness if he would request the defendant to sign the following memorandum which Maltman had prepared:

> "Referring to your note and trust deed bearing date June 7, 1915, covering our lots 22, 23, and 24, block 8, Park tract, we have decided to issue a new note and trust deed, reducing the principal sum from 126 (?) to $11,000 on same term and note of interest, as heretofore.

Our Mr. C. L. Van Deventer holds the title to said property in trust for the Hammond Lumber Company as a matter of convenience and will sign all the necessary papers."

This memorandum, obviously, was to secure binding authority from the defendant for the transaction between the plaintiff and Van Deventer. Johnson testified that he with Maltman went to the office of the Title Guarantee & Trust Company of Los Angeles and Maltman asked a Mr. Samuel of that company if the memorandum would bind the defendant, at the same time showing him the writing; that Samuel replied that it would not, to which Maltman answered: "Well, this won't do, then." The witness interposed and said: "Well, all right, Maltman, we have told you all along the Hammond Lumber Company would not sign the paper and would not obligate themselves." Maltman and Johnson then left the trust company office and walked a considerable distance therefrom when the conversation concerning the proposed transfer of the property to Van Deventer was renewed and Johnson said to Maltman that he would be better off by accepting $2,000 "and taking this dummy (Van Deventer being so referred to) than he would be to go ahead and foreclose on the other one, where we were not responsible; that we would not change our condition any from that, and he would have $2,000 on that debt paid anyway. I said to him that Elliott was not the Hammond Lumber Company, and he was certainly man enough in the business world to know that he wasn't." Maltman thereupon stated: "I will take this proposition," and the two then returned to the trust company office, where Maltman stated to Samuel that he had accepted the proposition and asked Samuel to write a receipt for the $2,000, which Samuel did. It was stipulated that Van Deventer was "purely a dummy in relation to the conveyances, trust deed, and note, signed by him as disclosed by the evidence, and that he was paid therefor by the Hammond Lumber Company the sum of $25." The whole trend of Johnson's testimony was that the transfer to the "dummy" (Van Deventer) was for the purpose of releasing the defendant from any liability whatsoever upon the obligation.

The testimony of Johnson sufficiently supports the finding that the defendant was not liable for the indebtedness evidenced by the purported note of Van Deventer, or, in other words, was not liable upon the note in suit; that, even if the defendant ever considered itself as liable on the Elliott or McLeod note, the Van Deventer transaction was negotiated and consummated for the purpose of relieving the defendant from any further liability upon the obligation and that the payment of the $2,000 to plaintiff, for which he executed a written receipt at the time of the execution of the Van Deventer note and trust deed, was the consideration for the release of the defendant from any further liability in connection with the transaction. The fact is that the uncontroverted testimony of Johnson that Maltman insisted that the defendant should sign the memorandum referred to strongly tends to show that Maltman himself did not think or assume that the note from McLeod to him or even the note from Elliott to him constituted a binding obligation against the defendant.

The case of Karns v. Olney, 80 Cal. 90, 22 Pac. 57, 13 Am. St. Rep. 101, cited by appellant, is, in its facts, altogether different from the case at bar, and, therefore, bears no relevancy to the present consideration. There an agent, in the presence of his principals, orally agreed to sell certain lots to the appellant for a certain price. The latter, in obedience to the agreement, and in the presence of the principals, made at the time the required cash payment. Appellant took immediate possession of the lots and proceeded to and did make substantial improvements thereon with the knowledge of the vendors or the principals in the transaction. The action was for the specific performance of said contract. The trial court decided the case against the plaintiff (appellant), and the Supreme Court, on appeal, reversed the judgment and ordered the court below to enter judgment upon its findings in favor of the plaintiff. The decision in said case followed from a pertinent application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel. See Kinsell v. Thomas, 18 Cal. App. 683, 124 Pac. 220. In the present case, as we have shown, there was, so far as the record here discloses, no agreement by the defendant to purchase the land, nor was it shown that any of the transactions relating to the said land were carried on in the presence of the defendant or any one properly authorized to act for it in the premises, or that there was a memorandum in writing evidencing a sale or transfer of the property to the defendant through any one authorized to act for it, or any money paid by defendant or any person to plaintiff as an earnest of any bargain relating to said land or for any purpose, except the payment of the $2,000 on the execution of the Van Deventer transaction.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. THOMPSON v. SAN BERNARDINO HIGH SCHOOL DIST. et al.

(Civ. 4108.)

1. Constitutional law 🔑62—Act held not to place power of annexation to high school district in officials having no legislative power; "recommendation"; "shall."

Pol. Code, § 1734b, as added by St. 1921, p. 722, § 1, providing that on recommendation of the county superintendent of schools and the supervisor of the district to be annexed the board of supervisors shall annex such school district to the high school district, is not invalid as placing in the superintendent and supervisor the power of annexation; the significance of "recommendation" being a mere suggestion as to desirability of a course of action to be pursued by the board, and "shall" of the act being a term of direction only, it being within the discretion of the board to act.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Recommendation; Shall.]

2. Statutes 🔑259—Statute may be so drawn as to be operative on happening of contingency.

A statute may be so drawn that on the happening of some prescribed contingency it shall become operative.

3. Statutes 🔑227—Rule of construction to give mandatory term a directory meaning stated.

Whenever the text of a statute and the intent of the Legislature, as gathered either from the particular statute or from it in connection with other related statutes, show that the real meaning of the Legislature was that apparently mandatory words should be given a directory meaning, they will be given such construction.

4. Statutes 🔑227—Rule of construction of words of command as permissive only stated.

Whatever is within the ascertained intention of the Legislature is as much a part of a statute as are written words therein contained, and if the intent conflict with the literal meaning, especially where the rights of the public are involved, words of command may be construed as permissive or as carrying discretionary powers.

5. Statutes 🔑96(2)—Statute providing for annexation of common school district to high school district held not special legislation.

Pol. Code, § 1734b, as added by St. 1921, p. 722, § 1, which, after providing generally for annexation of common school districts to high school districts, provides, instead of annexation, for a tax levy on a common school district to be paid into the special fund of a high school most accessible thereto where it is governed by an appointive board, is not special legislation providing for annexation only to high school districts governed by such a board.

6. Schools and school districts 🔑22—Statute providing for annexation of common school districts to high school districts held not invalid as subjecting district to taxation and local government without representation.

Pol. Code, § 1734b, as added by St. 1921, p. 722, § 1, providing for annexing common school districts to high school districts, is not invalid as subjecting annexed districts to taxation and local government without representation.

7. Schools and school districts 🔑90—Statutes 🔑64(4)—Statute providing for annexing common school district to high school district held not, in connection with another statute, to violate prohibition against incurring indebtedness, since it is independent thereof and indebtedness is thrust on district and not incurred.

Pol. Code, § 1734b, as added by St. 1921, p. 722, § 1, providing for annexing a common school district to the nearest high school district, though containing no provision directly affecting the payment by the former of either principal or interest on outstanding bonds of the latter, is not invalid under Const. art. 11, § 18, against incurring without assent of electors indebtedness exceeding in any year the income for such year, because section 1747 requires the county board of supervisors to annually levy taxes for interest and redemption of a high school district bonds, since, assuming the latter section applies and it becomes the duty of the board to levy a tax including property in the annexed district to pay "interest and redemption" on such bonds, each section is independent and neither is essential to the other, though one in a measure may supplement the other, and furthermore, if section 1734b is construed as part of section 1747, the debt or liability created against the high school district is not incurred by it, but is thrust on it primarily by the board of supervisors and secondarily by operation of law.

8. Statutes 🔑64(1)—Statute invalid in part only, not invalid as a whole if intent shown to enact valid part irrespective of invalid provision.

Where an invalid provision of an act is severable from other provisions, so that, the objectionable part being eliminated, the remainder is capable of being carried into effect, and it is clear that the Legislature intended to enact such remainder irrespective of the part claimed to be void, that part of the act which is free from fault will stand and be considered as though the invalid part were omitted.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Quo warranto by the People, on the relation of R. S. Thompson, against the San Bernardino High School District and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Henry Goodcell, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

W. J. Hartzell, of Redlands, and Leonard, Surr & Hellyer, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. This is an action in the nature of quo warranto brought for the purpose of annulling or declaring void an order made by the board of supervisors of San Bernardino county purporting to annex Highland school district to San Bernardino high school district upon proceedings had under section 1734b of the Political Code, as added by St. 1921, p. 722, § 1. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and judgment was thereupon entered that "the plaintiffs take nothing by their said action." The appeal is from the judgment.

San Bernardino high school district, before the order made by the board of supervisors herein referred to, was identical with the territory included within San Bernardino school district, and said districts were governed in common by a board of education elected by the electors residing within the San Bernardino high school district. Highland school district is a school district situate within ten miles of San Bernardino high school district. Highland school district has never maintained a high school, nor formed part of or been annexed to any high school district, except in so far as it may have been annexed to said San Bernardino high school district by the order to which reference has heretofore been made. On August 31, 1921, the board of supervisors of San Bernardino county adopted an order for the annexation of said Highland school district, together with ten other such districts, to said San Bernardino high school district. Said order was made under and by virtue of section 1734b of the Political Code, and was so made pursuant to recommendation of the county superintendent of schools of said San Bernardino county and of the supervisor of said county in whose district said high school was situated, after publication of notice as prescribed by said section, and was so made without any authorization or procedure and without any consent by or on the part of said Highland school district or any of the officers, residents or taxpayers thereof. At the time said order was made said San Bernardino high school district was indebted in the sum of $200,000 on account of bonds theretofore issued and still outstanding, which bonds become due and payable in installments extending over several years hereafter.

It is contended that section 1734b of the Political Code is unconstitutional in the following respects: (1) That it places the power of annexation in the hands of officials having no legislative authority; (2) that it is special legislation in that it provides for annexation only to high school districts that are governed by an appointive school board; (3) that it subjects annexed districts to taxation and local government without representation; (4) that it subjects annexed districts to taxation for outstanding bonds of the high school district.

Section 1734b of the Political Code provides, in part:

> "Not later than August thirty-first, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-one, the board of supervisors of each county or city and county in which there are one or more high school districts, and in which there are one or more common school districts not members of any high school district at the time of the passage of this act shall upon recommendation of the county superintendent of schools, annex each of such common school districts to that high school district whose high school is most easily accessible to the children of the particular common school district; provided, that no common school district shall be annexed to such high school districts without the recommendation of the county superintendent of schools, and the supervisor or supervisors in whose district or districts said common school districts may be located; and provided, further, that no common school district shall be annexed unless the nearest point of such common school district lies within ten miles of a high school district."

[1] It is contended that because section 1734b of the Political Code provides that, upon the recommendation of the county superintendent of schools and the supervisor in whose supervisorial district the district to be annexed is located, the board of supervisors shall annex such school district to the high school district, the statute is unconstitutional in that it places the power of annexation in the hands of officials having no legislative authority. It may be conceded that neither a county superintendent of schools nor a single supervisor in his individual capacity, acting outside a board meeting, nor both of them combined, has any legislative authority. Among the definitions found in Funk and Wagnalls New Standard Dictionary for the word "recommend" are the following:

> "Offer with favorable representations; praise as desirable, advantageous, trustworthy, or advisable; speak in behalf of; counsel as to a course of action."

Taking the word "recommendation" in this instance to carry any one of the foregoing meanings, its significance is a mere suggestion as to the desirability of a certain course of action to be pursued by the board of supervisors. However, the statute contains the provision that upon such "suggestion" being made the board shall "annex each of such common school districts to that high school district whose high school is most easily accessible to the children of the particular common school district." The power of legislation is not placed in the hands of officials having no legislative authority—only the power of making a recommendation. The actual legislation upon that matter is still left with the board of supervisors—the legislative body of the county having power and authority to legislate therein. The effect of the statute as to the "recommendation" and as to the action to be taken thereon by the board of supervisors is no more than though the statute, instead of providing for a recommendation by the county superintendent of schools, had prescribed that whenever from any source it should appear "advisable," or "desirable," or "advantageous" to the board of supervisors that any common school district should be annexed to a high school district, the board of supervisors should make the necessary order or resolution to that effect.

[2] It is well settled that a statute may be so drawn that upon the happening of some prescribed contingency it shall become operative, or that it may remain in force until abrogated for like reason. In the case of People v. Dunn, 80 Cal. 211, 22 Pac. 140, 13 Am. St. Rep. 118, it is held that an act of the Legislature giving to certain persons the authority to select a site for a public building, and providing further that no purchase of such site should be made without the approval of the Governor of the state, thus leaving it partly, at least, to the Governor whether or not the act should take effect, was not a delegation of legislative functions.

Mr. Justice Harlan, in the case of Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 12 Sup. Ct. 495, 36 L. Ed. 294, after an exhaustive review of the authorities and early precedents in connection with that provision of the Tariff Act of 1890, which, among other things, gives the President of the United States the power to suspend operation of certain clauses in the Tariff Act "when he may deem proper," held that the legislation was purely contingent; that it provided for the ascertainment of an event in the future which was defined by the act and directed to be evidenced by presidential proclamation; and that it prescribed the consequences which were to follow upon that proclamation. He reaches the conclusion that "such proclamation was wholly in the nature of an executive act, a prescribed mode of ascertainment, which involved no exercise by the President of what belonged to the lawmaking power."

Hobart v. Board of Supervisors of Butte Co., 17 Cal. 23, is also a well-considered case having a general bearing upon the subject, and is authority for the broad statement of law that "an act granting power to be exercised upon such conditions as the Legislature may impose, is no delegation of legislative authority nor is it invalid."

Considering a "recommendation" as carrying the meaning only of a suggestion as to the desirability of a certain action, the apparently mandatory "shall" fades into nothing more than a term of direction. There is ample authority for holding "shall" to be directory rather than mandatory especially in a matter, as here, which relates to the performance of a public duty. It is no part of the duty of either or both of the officials mentioned in the statute to legislate upon any matter. On the other hand, it is most emphatically the duty of the board of supervisors, as a board, to perform legislative functions, and the presumption is that the legislative department of the county government would have an exclusive right to determine not only the preliminary question as to the desirability or the advisability of annexing a common school district to a high school district, but as well to ultimately enact the necessary legislative act to bring about that result.

[3, 4] "Shall" or "must" are frequently construed as directory terms. Whenever the text of a statute and the intent of the Legislature as a body, as gathered either from the particular statute under consideration or from it in connection with other related statutes, show that the real meaning of the Legislature was that apparently mandatory words shall be given a directory meaning, they will be given such a construction. Whatever is within the ascertained intention of the Legislature is just as much a part of the statute as are the written words therein contained, and if the intent conflict with the literal meaning, especially where the rights of the public are involved, words of command may be construed as permissive, or as carrying discretionary powers. People v. Sanitary District of Chicago, 184 Ill. 597, 56 N. E. 953; Clancy v. McElroy, 30 Wash. 567, 70 Pac. 1095; First National Bank of Seneca v. Lyman, 59 Kan. 410, 53 Pac. 125; Cooke v. Spears, 2 Cal. 409; Estate of Chadbourne, 15 Cal. App. 366, 114 Pac. 1012. The case of Board of Education of the City of Sacramento v. Board of Trustees of the City of Sacramento, 96 Cal. at page 42, 30 Pac. 838, is illustrative. The statute there in question, among other things, provided in substance that it was the duty of the board of education to submit to the board of trustees an estimate of the amount of money that would be required for school purposes during the current year, and that upon receipt of same the board of trustees "shall" levy a direct school tax, etc. In holding that the word "shall" was merely directory, the court said:

> "The general rule in the construction of statutes relating to the performance of a public duty which does not affect any private rights or interests, but concerns the public alone, is, that the language of the statute, although imperative in terms, must be regarded as directory rather than mandatory."

A similar question was raised on nearly identical facts in the case of Board of Education of the City of Woodland v. Board of Trustees, etc., 129 Cal. 599, 62 Pac. 173, and the court affirmed the decision in the Sacramento Case, especially with reference to the effect of the provisions of the statute, closing with the remark that "the language used must therefore be held, as in the Sacramento Case, to be directory only." In a case involving a section of the Political Code which at the time provided in substance that, on the neglect of persons who excavate ditches across public highways to bridge such ditches, "the road overseer for that road district shall construct the same," the court, taking other statutes into consideration, ruled that the word "shall" should be construed as "may."

The statute, in addition to prescribing the manner in which the desirability of annexing a common school district to a high school district shall be brought to the attention of the board of supervisors, also vests a discretionary power in the board as to the high school district to which the common school district shall be annexed, dependent upon the accessibility of the latter to the former; and providing further that a notice shall be given by the board of a hearing on the matter, with the ultimate right of determination therein resting in the electors residing within the confines of the school district proposed to be annexed. No legislative power is attempted to be conferred upon the county superintendent of schools or upon the individual supervisor—only the right to make a recommendation, which recommendation suggests to the board of supervisors the propriety of, or the advantages which may accrue from, enacting legislation having the effect of annexing a given common school district to an undesignated high school district, as the board of supervisors in its discretion or the electorate of the common school district may determine. Such provisions in the statute are indicative of the intent of the Legislature with respect particularly to the effect of the word "shall"; that is to say, whether that word should be construed as mandatory or merely directory, in connection with the duties of the board of supervisors upon the receipt by the board of the "recommendation" by the county superintendent of schools. It therefore becomes apparent that the intent of the Legislature was, upon the recommendation of certain designated officials, to enact such legislation as would give the board of supervisors the authority to be exercised at its discretion to do the things enumerated in the enabling statute.

[5] Appellant contends that the statute in question "is special legislation in that it provides for annexation only to high school districts that are governed by an appointive school board." As a matter of fact, the statute contains no provision with reference to the annexation of a common school district to a high school district having an appointive school board. The statute, after providing generally for annexation of common school districts to high school districts, further provides:

> "That where the high school district which is most accessible to a majority of the pupils of the common school district attending high school is governed by an appointive school board, that the board of supervisors instead of annexing said common school district to the high school district having an appointive school board shall cause to be levied upon the property of such elementary school district a tax which shall produce an amount computed as follows: From the entire cost of maintenance of the high school for the year plus the interest and payments on bonds of said high school district for the year, there shall be subtracted the entire income of such high school from state and county sources; the remainder shall be divided by the units of average daily attendance in said high school, and the quotient so obtained shall be multiplied by the units of average daily attendance of pupils from the aforesaid elementary school district. Said amount shall be levied and collected from such elementary school district in the usual way and shall be paid into the special fund of the high school district."

It is urged that there is no reason why annexation should be required in one case and prohibited in the other, or why an annexed high school district should be required to contribute to the high school fund in proportion to its taxable property, while the common school district not annexed should pay taxes in proportion to actual attendance of its children in the high school. The fact that one class of school districts is dealt with by the law in a manner different from that in which another class is treated is in itself no sufficient reason for declaring the law to be special legislation and hence inimical to the constitutional provision. The discrimination in the creation of a class among school districts, or in the manner of providing for the maintenance of the high school in either class, in order to fall within the inhibition of the Constitution, must be arbitrary, not uniform in its operation, and not founded upon some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction. City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 251, 27 Pac. 604; Darcy v. Mayor of San Jose, 104 Cal. 642, 38 Pac. 500; Rode v. Siebe, 119 Cal. 521, 51 Pac. 869, 39 L. R. A. 342; Deyoe v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 481, 74 Pac. 28, 98 Am. St. Rep. 73; Ex parte King, 157 Cal. 164, 106 Pac. 578. In the Deyoe Case it is said that—

> "The classification must not be arbitrary for the mere purpose of classification, but must be founded upon some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction which will suggest a reason which might rationally be held to justify the diversity in the legislation."

The classification here as to annexation is not whimsical, but it is most natural, and the statute has a uniform application. By rules of law not here under consideration it is provided that some school districts be governed by an appointive board of trustees, while other such boards shall be elected to office. In the matter of taxation some common school districts may have few children who may attend high school; other common school districts may have many. It is proper that the several districts pay taxes according to the benefits received. The statute in question merely recognizes existing conditions and provides for the maintenance of each class of school districts by an appropriate method of taxation.

[6] Appellant's third point with reference to the unconstitutionality of section 1734b, in that "it subjects annexed districts to taxation and local government without representation," is completely answered by the case of Board of Education of the City of San Rafael v. Davidson (Cal. Sup.) 210 Pac. 961. The facts of that case are nearly identical with the facts herein. A matter involving the particular point was squarely before the court and the ruling was directly opposed to appellant's contention. Among other things, the court said:

> "We conclude, therefore, that under the state school law as followed by the charter of San Rafael it is contemplated that outlying and adjacent elementary school districts may be annexed to a city high school district for high school purposes, and that the district so consolidated is to be under the government and control of the city board of education and the annexed territory becomes part of the city for the purpose of electing such board."

[7] As a final contention on the part of appellant it is urged that section 1734b is void for the reason that it subjects annexed districts to taxation for outstanding bonds of the high school district.

Section 18 of article 11 of the California Constitution provides, among other things, in substance, that no board of education or school district shall incur any indebtedness or liability exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof voting at an election held for that purpose. Section 1734b contains no provision directly affecting the question of the payment by annexed common school districts of either the principal or the interest on any outstanding bonds on the high school district to which such common school district may be annexed. But as to the common school districts which are not annexed but which are most accessible to a given high school district which is governed by an appointive board of trustees, the section provides that the board of supervisors, instead of annexing the common school district to the high school district—

> "shall cause to be levied upon the property of such elementary school district a tax * * * computed as follows: From the entire cost of maintenance of the high school for the year plus the interest and payments on bonds of said high school district for the year, there shall be subtracted," etc. "Said amount shall be levied and collected from such elementary school district in the usual way and shall be paid into the special fund of the high school district."

Section 1747 of the Political Code provides that—

> "The board of supervisors of the county whose superintendent of schools has jurisdiction over any high school district must annually, * * * levy a tax for that year * * * for the interest and redemption of all outstanding bonds of such district."

In view of the fact that at the time of the annexation of the common school district to the high school district here in question the high school district had outstanding bonds in the sum of $200,000, it is claimed that, if the annexed common school district should incur any liability for payment of any part of the existing bonded indebtedness of the high school district to which the common school district was annexed, the common school district would thereby incur at the time of such annexation a future liability exceeding its income provided for the current year without an election for that purpose, which liability is forbidden to be incurred by the section of the California Constitution to which reference has been made. It is argued by appellant that because section 1734b contains no direct provision with reference to property lying within an annexed common school district being taxable on account of the bonded indebtedness of the high school district to which such common school district is annexed, and because said section does provide for such taxation on that account where no annexation takes place, and because section 1734a of the Political Code, as added by St. 1919, p. 396, § 1, which has to do with annexation of common school districts to high school districts under certain prescribed conditions, especially exempts from taxation on account of the payment of bonded indebtedness the property lying within a common school district annexed as in section 1734a provided, it necessarily follows that the provision of section 1747 of the Political Code applies, which requires a tax to be levied upon all the taxable property in the high school district for the payment of the interest and redemption of all outstanding bonds of the high school district to which the common school district has been annexed; and it is also contended that under section 1747 of the Political Code the property of the high school district includes, not only the property which lay within it at the time the bonds were issued, but as well all other territory which was added thereto by reason of the annexation of any and all common school districts.

[8] Assuming, without deciding, that section 1747 of the Political Code applies, and, consequently, that under that section it became the duty of the board of supervisors to levy a tax on all the property in the high school district, including the property in the annexed common school district, to pay "interest and redemption" on all outstanding bonds of the high school district, it does not follow that section 1734b is unconstitutional. That section embraces a plan for annexing a common school district to a high school district, but no provision with reference to the levying of a tax in circumstances such as are here presented. Even though the section under attack were to contain a provision similar to the clause of section 1747 with reference to taxation, the rule of law is that if such provision be severable from the other provisions of the statute, so that the objectionable part being eliminated, the remainder of the statute is capable of being carried into effect, and it is clear that the Legislature intended to enact such remainder irrespective of the part of the statute claimed to be void, that part of the statute which is free from fault will stand and be considered as though the unconstitutional part were omitted. Cooley on Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed.) p. 246; Hale v. McGettigan, 114 Cal. 112, 45 Pac. 1049; People v. McFadden, 81 Cal. 500, 22 Pac. 851, 15 Am. St. Rep. 66; Federal Construction Co. v. Wold, 30 Cal. App. 360, 158 Pac. 340. The provisions of section 1747, at least so far as the clause here considered is concerned, have been a part of our law since as far back as 1909, while section 1734b was enacted in 1921. While one of these statutes may in a measure supplement the other, they are nevertheless entirely independent statutes, and neither of them is essential to the existence of the other. They are perfectly distinct and separable, and each of them contains just and useful provisions standing alone which are perhaps in nowise obnoxious to any constitutional objection.

There is another reason why section 1734b, even when construed as a part of section 1747, is not in conflict with the provisions of the California Constitution, which forbids a board of education or a common school district from incurring an indebtedness or liability greater than its current income for any one year without the assent of two-thirds of its qualified electors as expressed at an election held for that purpose. In order that one may "incur" a debt or a liability one must necessarily perform some act or take some action—in other words, one must do something that will have the effect of bringing upon one's self the debt or liability. In the instant case it cannot be said that the Highland school district did anything by which any indebtedness or liability was incurred against it. If any debt or liability was created as against the Highland school district, it was one which was not of its own choosing or making, but was thrust upon it primarily by the board of supervisors of San Bernardino county, and secondarily by operation of law. The cases are numerous which announce the principle that in such circumstances there is no infraction of the constitutional provision to which reference has been made. In the case of Lewis v. Widber, 99 Cal. 412, 33 Pac. 1128, which involved a consideration of the constitutional provision here in question, the court said:

> "It is quite apparent, however, that this clause of the Constitution [section 18 of article 11] refers only to an indebtedness or liability which one of the municipal bodies mentioned has itself incurred—that is, an indebtedness which the municipality has contracted, or a liability resulting, in whole or in part, from some act or conduct of such municipality. Such is the plain meaning of the language used. The clear intent expressed in the said clause was to limit and restrict the power of the municipality as to any indebtedness or liability which it has discretion to incur or not to incur."

In Long Beach v. Lisenby, 180 Cal. 56, 179 Pac. 198, the foregoing language is quoted with approval, and in McCracken v. San Francisco, 16 Cal. 632, where a similar provision of a section of the city charter of the city of San Francisco was under consideration, the court said:

> "We are clear that the provision refers only to the acts or contracts of the city, and not to liabilities which the law may cast upon her."

In 28 Cyc. at page 1541, where many cases are cited as establishing the principle, it is said:

> "Limitations on municipal indebtedness do not apply to such liabilities as are cast by law upon the corporation, but only to those created by voluntary act or contracts."

The following California cases also support the principle: Welch v. Strother, 74 Cal. 416, 16 Pac. 22; Federal Construction Co. v. Wold, 30 Cal. App. 360, 158 Pac. 340; Harrison v. Horton, 5 Cal. App. 419, 90 Pac. 716; Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Deasy, 41 Cal. App. 674, 183 Pac. 243.

The case of People v. Hanford Union High School District, 148 Cal. 705, 84 Pac. 193, was one in which the board of trustees of a common school district, in agreeing that the common school district be annexed to a high school district, as a part of the "terms" of annexation, attempted to bind the common school district by an agreement with the trustees of the high school district to pay "its pro rata of the taxes for the liquidation of interest and bonded indebtedness of said Hanford Union high school district."[3] No election was held for the purpose of procuring the assent of two-thirds of the electors of the common school district. It was held that the order of annexation made by the board of supervisors was ineffectual for any purpose; but that decision is not "out of line" with the other decisions of this state for the reason that it appears the incurred indebtedness or liability on the part of the common school district was the result of an agreement between the two boards of trustees, and was not such a debt or a liability as was cast by law upon the school district.

It is the conclusion of this court that section 1734b of the Political Code is not subject to appellant's specified objections thereto.

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

BRIGGS v. KOSICH. (Civ. 4566.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 6, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Findings on conflicting evidence conclusive.

A court of review cannot interfere with findings on conflicting evidence.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1071(5)—Finding as to immaterial fact harmless.

In a partner's action for dissolution and for an accounting defended on the ground that the plaintiff had previously sold his interest in the business to the defendant, in which there was no issue as to the amount of the consideration paid and the only issue was whether the firm had been previously dissolved by such sale, an inaccurate finding as to the extent of the consideration was harmless; the amount thereof being immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; George Samuels, Judge.

Action by Lewis Briggs against A. R. Kosich. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Glickman & Glickman, of Oakland, for appellant.

William W. Laidley, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to dissolve a partnership alleged to be existing between the two parties, and to obtain an accounting. The trial court awarded him a judgment and the defendant has appealed. The plaintiff's complaint alleged the formation of a partnership, the commencement of business thereunder on the 18th day of August, 1921, and that the partnership conducted and managed a garage at 420 Twenty-Third street, in Oakland. The plaintiff further alleged that on the 5th day of January, 1922, the defendant sold the partnership business and refused to account to the plaintiff for any of the proceeds. Thereupon the plaintiff prayed that the partnership be dissolved, that an accounting be had, and for other relief. The defendant came forward with an answer in which he admitted the creation of the partnership, and the sale of the business; but he denied that the sale was wrongful, or without the assent of the plaintiff, or that he held any of the proceeds in trust for the plaintiff. In addition to his denials the defendant set forth that on the 16th day of December, 1921, the plaintiff sold his interest to the defendant for the sum of $20, and an agreement on the part of the defendant that the defendant would assume and pay the partnership debts. The sale to the defendant was alleged to have been evidenced by a bill of sale which the defendant pleaded in hæc verba. On the issues so made the parties went to trial. The trial court thereafter duly made its findings and ordered judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $550.

The appellant strenuously contends that the bill of sale to him should have been treated by the trial court as an absolute transfer in præsenti, whereas the trial court, on that subject, made findings as follows:

> "That on or about the 16th day of December, 1921, plaintiff at request of defendant executed and delivered to defendant a bill of sale of all of plaintiff's right, title, and interest in and to said garage business, said bill of sale being given by plaintiff to defendant for the purpose of allowing plaintiff to seek employment elsewhere and also for the purpose of enabling defendant, should the occasion arise, to consummate sale of said garage business for and on account of said copartnership. That the only consideration for said bill of sale was the sum of $20.
> "That on the 5th day of January, 1922, defendant was not the sole and absolute owner of said garage business located as aforesaid, but that said garage business was then and there the property of and belonged to plaintiff and defendant in equal shares as copartners therein; that said bill of sale was not an absolute conveyance to defendant of plaintiff's right, title, and interest in said garage business, but that defendant took said bill of sale solely and only as the agent of plaintiff in order that defendant could without undue delay, consummate a sale of said garage business for and on account of said copartnership."

[1] On the subjects contained in the foregoing findings there was conflicting evidence. The plaintiff testified in support of the theory on which the findings were framed. The defendant gave testimony to the effect that the bill of sale was, and was intended to be, an absolute transfer taking effect as of its date. Under these circumstances a court of review is not entitled to interfere.

[2] Appellant objects to the finding "that the only consideration for said bill of sale was the sum of $20," and contends that the bill of sale to the defendant was as stated in the bill of sale, "in consideration of the sum of $20 gold coin of the United States," and he also calls attention to the last sentence in the bill of sale, which is that "Mr. Kosich is to resume all obligations of the said garage," and he contends that that sentence is to be construed as though the word "resume" were the word "assume," and that the subject-matter constituted additional consideration. These contentions are but to present a false issue. The real issue involved was dissolution or no dissolution. The bill of sale, made for a consideration or no consideration, was but one item of evidence of proof on the subject before the court—dissolution or no dissolution. Rowe v. Simmons, 113 Cal. 688, 45 Pac. 983. It was not contended in the trial court, and it is not contended in this court, that the purported bill of sale was inoperative for any purpose because it was not supported by any consideration, or because the consideration was insufficient. But, admitting it was an operative transfer, the issue is, "For what purpose?" The amount of the consideration was immaterial.

We do not understand the appellant to contend that the trial court failed to give the appellant credit for all expenditures made by him on behalf of the partnership business. An examination of the record shows that the appellant's counsel was permitted to introduce evidence on every item which it was contended the appellant had expended, and later the trial court gave the appellant credit for all of those items.

We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for defendant given after a general demurrer to plaintiff's second amended complaint was sustained by the court and upon plaintiff's failure to further amend her pleading.

The substance of the allegations of the complaint is that prior to August, 1921, plaintiff rented a certain "flat apartment property" from defendant, which was to be used by plaintiff as a dwelling, in which was located a disappearing wall bed, and which bed, on or about August 15, 1921, became broken and out of repair, of which fact plaintiff informed defendant and requested defendant to place the same in a safe condition for use by plaintiff, which defendant failed to do; that by reason of such failure on the part of defendant, and on or about November 11, 1921, the said bed collapsed and fell upon plaintiff, to her injury and damage, etc.

[1] At common law, in the absence of an express contract, there was no duty owing by the landlord to the tenant to make repairs, and consequently no liability was incurred by the landlord to the tenant arising from the defective condition of the leased premises. Brewster v. De Fremery, 33 Cal. 341; Van Every v. Ogg, 59 Cal. 565; Sieber v. Blanc, 76 Cal. 173, 18 Pac. 260; Willson v. Treadwell, 81 Cal. 58, 22 Pac. 304; Daley v. Quick, 99 Cal. 181, 33 Pac. 859. The right of the tenant to any relief in damages as against the landlord on account of injuries sustained by the tenant by reason of the defective condition of the leased premises is purely statutory, and such right must be measured solely by the provisions of the statute. Grazer v. Flanagan, 35 Cal. App. 724, 170 Pac. 1076; Callahan v. Loughran, 102 Cal. 476, 36 Pac. 835; Gately v. Campbell, 124 Cal. 523, 57 Pac. 567. With reference thereto, the statutes covering the apparent rights of the parties are to the effect that it is the duty of the lessor to repair dilapidations, and upon his neglect to do so, the lessee may either vacate the premises or make the necessary repairs himself where the cost thereof will not exceed in amount one month's rent of the premises. Civ. Code, §§ 1941, 1942.

[2, 3] In this case it is alleged in the complaint that—

> "On or about the 16th day of August, 1921, and at divers times thereafter, plaintiff informed defendant of the disabled and dilapidated condition of said bed, and requested defendant to repair and properly fix same and put it in a workable and safe condition for the use of plaintiff."

It must therefore be conclusively presumed that plaintiff was fully aware of the unsafe condition of the bed and, in the absence of any allegation in the complaint setting forth such attendant circumstances as would relieve plaintiff from the inference of contributory negligence, the rule of law that in such circumstances plaintiff assumed all risks which were obvious to ordinary observation would apply and preclude any recovery. Hatch v. McCloud R. Lumber Co., 150 Cal. 113, 88 Pac. 355; Grazer v. Flanagan, 35 Cal. App. 727, 170 Pac. 1076.

Ex parte BOGDEN. (Cr. 694.)

Prisons ⟹15—Prisoner not entitled to credit earned on shorter term on two sentences being commuted to single term.

Where, after a prisoner has served part of a 14-year sentence for burglary, he escaped, and on being recaptured the prison directors forfeited the credits earned and to be earned by him, a court sentenced him to a term of 4 years, to begin on the expiration of his 14-year term, and the Governor commuted the two sentences to a single term of 10 years, held, that the effect of the commutation was to reduce the longer term to 10 years and to make the two terms run concurrently; hence prisoner is not entitled to credit earned on the shorter term.

FINCH, P. J. Petitioner prosecutes this writ of habeas corpus to obtain his release from state prison on the ground that the term of his imprisonment has expired. He was sentenced to a term of 14 years' imprisonment for burglary of the first degree. He was received at the prison July 7, 1914. He escaped therefrom December 7, 1914, and was returned thereto February 27, 1915. As a penalty for such escape, the state board of prison directors, on March 3, 1915, duly forfeited all credits earned and to be earned by him. He was also tried in court on the charge of having so escaped and was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment for a term of 4 years, the imprisonment to commence at the expiration of his term of 14 years for burglary. December 20, 1922, the governor of the state commuted petitioner's term of service to a total of 10 years. The parts of the commutation material here are as follows:

> "The prisoner was punished once for his escape from prison by forfeiture of his credits amounting to five years and two months and was given a sentence of four years additional upon his conviction in court. * * * Unless Bogden is given relief through executive clemency he will not be eligible for parole until 1930. It was for this reason that a majority of justices of the Supreme Court and the peace authorities who prosecuted Bogden joined in recommending commutation of his sentence as excessive. Now, therefore, I, Wm. D. Stephens, Governor of California, do hereby commute the two sentences of the said John Bogden to a single term of ten years, including time served."

Petitioner contends that—

> The Governor "aggregated his two sentences to one sentence of 18 years, and commuted this to a sentence of 10 years. The credits on aggregated 18 years amount to 6 years and 10 months, and the credits forfeited by the board of prison directors, on petitioner's previous sentence of 18 years, were 5 years and 2 months. Therefore petitioner is entitled to 20 months' credits on his previous sentence of 18 years, and those credits shall be deducted on his present sentence of 10 years, which was fixed by the Governor. Or, if petitioner's previous sentence is legally dead, then any action of the state board of prison directors taken on his previous sentence is null and void, and the petitioner not having lost any of his credits on his present sentence of 10 years, therefore he is entitled to all his credit deductions which are allowed by law on his present sentence of 10 years."

The commutation did not have the effect of nullifying the sentences imposed by the court or substituting therefor a new sentence by the Governor, but it merely reduced the length of time to be served under those sentences. While the Governor may reduce the length of service under a sentence, he is without power to impose one. In Duehay v. Thompson, 223 Fed. 305, 138 C. C. A. 547, two sentences of four years each, running consecutively, were commuted to run concurrently. The court said:

> "The executive has superimposed its mind upon the judgment of the court; but the sentence remains, nevertheless, the judgment of the court, and not of the executive, and is subject to the regulations of law respecting its enforcement."

Petitioner's rights after the commutation are the same as they would be if he had been sentenced originally to 10 years' imprisonment. Of course, the time heretofore served is to be deducted from the 10 years to which his imprisonment has been reduced by the commutation.

The only uncertainty as to the meaning of the commutation arises out of the fact that petitioner's credits on the term of 14 years were forfeited, while those on the term of 4 years were not. Had each term been commuted to a shorter period, to run consecutively, petitioner would have been entitled to credits on the term last imposed by the court. In consideration of the reasons, as stated in the order of commutation, for the exercise of executive clemency and the absence of specification of the sentence intended to be reduced, a reasonable construction of the commutation is that it was the intention to reduce the longer term to 10 years and, in effect, make the two terms run concurrently. So construing the commutation, petitioner's term of imprisonment has not expired.

The writ is denied.

PEOPLE v. ALEXANDER et al. (Cr. 1116.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 28, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 26, 1923.)

1. Infants ⚷68 — Conflicting evidence as to age held to support trial court's action in refusing to certify defendant to juvenile court.

Where the only evidence offered by defendant in a prosecution for murder to show that he was under the age of 18 was conflicting, uncertain, and unsatisfactory, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to certify him to the juvenile court.

2. Homicide ⚷254—Evidence held to support conviction of murder in second degree.

Evidence that, though there was no provocation defendant struck decedent, and after decedent walked away without retaliation pursued him, and while decedent had one hand in his pocket, defendant held the other and struck him a blow causing him to fall backwards, striking his head against the pavement, held to support a conviction of murder in the second degree in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 3.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

Tony Alexander was convicted of manslaughter, and Frank August Avilla was convicted of murder in the second degree, and they appeal. On defendant Tony Alexander's motion his appeal was dismissed. Judgment affirmed as to defendant Frank August Avilla.

Joseph P. Lacey, of Oakland, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. Defendants were jointly tried on an information charging them with the murder of one William H. Reinking.

The defendant Alexander was convicted of manslaughter, and the defendant Avilla was convicted of murder in the second degree. Both defendants have appealed from the respective judgments following the verdicts and from the orders denying their motions for a new trial. Prior to the submission of the appeals the defendant Alexander filed a dismissal of his appeal, and consideration, therefore, is given only to the appeal of the defendant Avilla.

The facts of the case are that, while the two defendants were loitering upon the streets of Oakland with a number of other companions on the evening of July 5, 1922, deceased was peaceably walking along one of the main streets of that city. As he passed these defendants and their companions the defendant Avilla hit him in the leg with a rock or clod of dirt without any provocation. The deceased paid no attention to the incident, but continued on his way, and after he had gone some distance the defendant Avilla said to defendant Alexander: "Come on, Mowie, and let's get that guy," calling the defendant Alexander by his nickname. Thereupon the two defendants started after the deceased, who was then about two blocks down the street. When they arrived within a short distance of the deceased, the defendant Avilla took off his coat and threw it to another one of his companions, and the two defendants then crossed the street and, running part of the way, caught up with the deceased. The defendant Avilla grabbed the deceased and held him by his right hand and said to him: "You are one of these wise guys from Alameda that hit me before." The deceased replied: "No, you are badly mistaken," and smiled. He attempted to break away from the defendant Avilla, and thereupon that defendant struck the deceased in the face, knocking him down. As the deceased fell the back of his head struck upon the hard pavement of the street, causing a basal fracture of the skull. Deceased never regained consciousness, but died a short time thereafter. It appears that the deceased was a young man of frail build; that throughout the occurrence he kept his left hand in his pocket, and that he made no resistance and no threats of any kind against either of the defendants. In fact, it appears without conflict that the attack was wholly without provocation, and that it was deliberate and inexcusable.

[1] On behalf of the appellant Avilla, it is argued that he should have been certified to the juvenile court upon the claim that he was under the age of 18 years. However, the only evidence offered by this appellant to prove that he was under the age of 18 years was so uncertain and unsatisfactory that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in accepting the conflicting evidence upon the same subject-matter.

[2] It is also urged that the offense, if any, was manslaughter and not murder. In this behalf it is argued that the striking of the blow which caused deceased to fall over upon the pavement was the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony, and that therefore the offense could be manslaughter only. But the intent to kill is plainly inferable from the evidence and the circumstances leading to the striking of the blow. It was shown without conflict that the deceased was a young man who had caused no offense or provocation for any attack upon him by these appellants; that the appellant Avilla, after having hit him with a rock or clod of dirt and having seen him go on his way without retaliation, persuaded his codefendant to join him in an attack upon the deceased, using the words: "Come on, Mowie, and let's get that guy." All the evidence goes to show that they deliberately pursued the deceased and that the blow was struck while the deceased had his left hand in his pocket and while the appellant Avilla held his right hand, thus causing him to fall backwards, with his head striking upon the hard pavement and without any opportunity of defending himself against the fall. It is presumed "that a person intends the ordinary consequence of his voluntary act" (subdivision 3, § 1963, Code Civ. Proc.), and this appellant must be presumed to have known that by holding the only free hand of the deceased fatal injuries would result from the striking of his head upon the hard pavement.

BROWN v. KENNEDY et al. (Civ. 2579.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 31, 1923.)

Waters and water courses 🔑179(4)—Evidence held to support finding that water destroying plaintiff's crops came from defendant's irrigated field.

Evidence held to support a finding that the water which flowed on plaintiff's land, destroying his crop of alfalfa and most of the trees in a small orchard, came from defendant's irrigated rice field.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by W. H. Brown against J. R. Kennedy and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Brown & Albery, of Colusa, for appellants.
Millington & Millington, of Colusa, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This appeal is from a judgment awarding the plaintiff damages, found by the court to have resulted from irrigation water which defendants caused to flow from their land to and upon that of plaintiff. The only question presented by the appeal is whether the evidence supports the findings.

Plaintiff is the owner of the north half of the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of a certain section of land. During the year 1920 the defendants raised a crop of rice on the northwest quarter of the same section. North of plaintiff's land there is a ridge extending from the northwest to the southeast through the northeast quarter of the section. Approximately parallel thereto, from about the center of the northwest quarter to the southeast corner of the section is another ridge. There is shown on the map a third ridge, connecting with the one last described at a point near the center of the northwest quarter and extending thence northerly. Midway between the parallel ridges the land is from four to five feet lower than at opposite points on the ridges; the slope being gradual from the higher to the lower points. The elevation of plaintiff's west boundary line is some five feet lower than that of the east line of defendants' land. It thus appears that plaintiff's land and a part of defendants' rice field are in a swale, and that surface water naturally flows from the latter to and across the former.

Plaintiff had 17 acres of alfalfa and a small orchard of bearing fruit trees on his land. The alfalfa and all but a few of the trees were destroyed by surface water and the rise of the water table during the year 1920. The only question to be determined is the source from which the water came. Between plaintiff's land and that of defendants, as will appear from the descriptions given, is a strip of land a quarter of a mile wide from east to west. Witnesses testified that water flowed out of defendants' rice field in the upper end of the swale across the intervening land and down to and upon the west and southwest parts of plaintiff's land; that the water table rose in other parts of his land, in some places coming to the surface, where prior and subsequent to the year 1920 it had stood eight feet below the surface. There was no rice raised in the swale above plaintiff's land other than that of defendants. The evidence stated is amply sufficient to support the finding that the water which did the damage came from the defendants' rice field. It is argued that the water probably came, through seepage or underground flow, from a main canal, a lateral, and other rice fields. Such argument goes to the weight of the evidence rather than to its sufficiency. It may be stated, however, that the evidence introduced by plaintiff shows that the marked rise of the water table occurred only in the year 1920, the one year in which defendants raised rice, while the other possible sources of the water existed prior and subsequent to that year. Since the weight of the evidence is exclusively for the determination of the trial court, there is no reason to state the evidence given in contradiction of the foregoing.

The judgment is affirmed.

HORNE v. STANDARD AUTO SALES CO.

(Civ. 4555.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 9, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑956(2)—Order granting or denying application for relief from effect of failure to file bill of exceptions in due time affirmed unless record clearly shows abuse of discretion.

Unless the record clearly shows that the trial court abused its discretion in denying appellant's application to be relieved from the effect of its failure to file a bill of exceptions in due time, the order granting or denying the application will be affirmed.

2. Exceptions, bill of 🔑43(1)—Denial of motion for relief from effect of failure to file bill of exceptions in due time held not clear abuse of discretion.

The trial court held not to have clearly abused its discretion in denying a motion for relief from the effect of failure to file a bill of exceptions in due time, in view of an affidavit by appellee's attorney indicating appellant's attorney's negligence in informing attorneys substituted for him of an extension of time not in accord with his written office memorandum.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by F. L. Horne against the Standard Auto Sales Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for relief from the effect of its failure to file a bill of exceptions in due time, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sloss, Ackerman & Bradley, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Marion Vecki and A. Walter Allen, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from an order of the trial court denying defendant's motion to be relieved from the effect of objections taken by plaintiff to proposed bill of exceptions because of defendant's failure to file said bill in due time. The motion of defendant was made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It appears by the affidavits upon which the motion was considered by the trial court that, after the plaintiff had obtained a judgment in the action for damages for personal injuries, the respective attorneys for plaintiff and defendant negotiated with a view to compromising the claim and avoiding any further litigation. By stipulation between said attorneys the defendant's time for serving and filing proposed bill of exceptions was extended to November 25, 1921. On that date attorney for defendant requested of the attorney for plaintiff a further extension of 10 days, which was granted. At the expiration of said time (December 5, 1921) attorney for defendant telephoned to the attorney for the plaintiff and requested an additional 10 days, stating that the representative of the defendant company was in Los Angeles, and would come to San Francisco within a few days to confer with reference to payment of the judgment. The attorney for the plaintiff refused to grant an extension of ten days, but stipulated that the defendant might have 5 days' additional time, or until December 10, 1921, within which to serve and file said proposed bill of exceptions. On December 10, 1921, attorney for defendant again telephoned the attorney for the plaintiff, and asked for 10 days' additional time, stating that within such time he hoped to convince the representative of the defendant company of the wisdom of paying the judgment. Attorney for plaintiff refused to grant an extension of more than 5 days. Thereupon attorney for defendant pleaded that he be allowed the remainder of the week, and attorney for plaintiff finally extended defendant's time for six days, or until December 16, 1921.

No attempt was made to secure further time, and the bill of exceptions was not served and filed until December 20, 1921, at which time plaintiff objected to its settlement, and his objection was sustained. Then followed the motion of the defendant to be relieved of the effect of its default, and from the order denying such motion the defendant has appealed. Before the filing of said bill of exceptions, to wit, on December 8, 1921, the law firm of Sloss, Ackerman & Bradley was substituted in the place and stead of the former attorneys for the defendant. Said substitution was dated December 8, 1921, and copy of same was served upon the attorney for plaintiff and filed on December 12, 1921, and said substituted attorneys prepared and filed the proposed bill of exceptions, settlement of which was denied.

In support of its claim that the delay in filing the proposed bill of exceptions was due to mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect warranting relief, under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, the defendant presented to the court the affidavit of one of the attorneys who represented the defendant at the trial of the action, which was to the effect that he thought he had arranged, in a telephonic conversation, with attorney for plaintiff for an extension of 10 days' time within which to file proposed bill of exceptions, and for 6 days' time within which to file undertaking to stay execution; that through some mistake "the time stated in said stipulation for preparing and serving said bill of exceptions was substituted for the time within which defendant was required to give an undertaking to stay execution"; that affiant was not aware of such mistake until advised by Mr. Ackerman "a few days since." Said affidavit was dated January 6, 1922. There was also presented to the trial court the affidavit of Mr. Ackerman, which recited that on the morning of December 10, 1921, the former attorney for defendant had telephoned to affiant stating that he had secured an extension of 10 days' time within which to prepare and serve a proposed bill of exceptions and file bond; that thereupon affiant entered in his office record the date of December 20, 1921, as the date when said bill of exceptions was due, and that affiant was not informed until December 30, 1921, that the said extension of time for filing said bill of exceptions actually expired on December 16, 1921.

In rebuttal there appears in the record the affidavit of attorney for plaintiff, which recites many of the facts herein set out, and states further that on or about December 30, 1921, affiant discussed with the attorney who had represented defendant at the trial of this action the matter of the stipulations for extension of time; that at that time said attorney for defendant showed to affiant his office diary, and affiant saw, under date of December 16, 1921, the memorandum "Horne v. Standard, bill of exceptions due," and on the same line another memorandum "substitution, drop"; that said attorney for defendant thereupon remarked to affiant, "my memorandum seems to bear you out."

[1, 2] This case falls within the well-settled rule announced in Ingrim v. Epperson, 137 Cal. 370, 70 Pac. 165, and followed by numerous decisions in this state to the effect that, unless the record clearly shows that the trial court has abused its discretion in a matter of this kind, its order, whether it be to grant or deny the application, will be affirmed. We think the record here does not clearly show an abuse of discretion. If the trial court gave weight to the affidavit of attorney for plaintiff, as it had the right to do, it must have believed that the attorney for the defendant was negligent in informing those substituted in his place and stead of an extension of time for filing said proposed bill of exceptions which was not in accord with his own written office memorandum of the same. Under such a view of the matter there was no excusable neglect.

It seems idle to review herein the numerous authorities in this state on so well-settled a proposition as that involved upon this appeal, and we shall only repeat, as an expression of our own view in the present case, the statement of our Supreme Court in the case of Alferitz v. Cahen, 145 Cal. 397, 399, 78 Pac. 878, 879:

> "While it may be conceded that, if the trial court in this case had reached the opposite determination, and had vacated its judgment, to the end that H. Cahen might be permitted to defend the litigation upon its merits, this court would not have disturbed the conclusion, upon the other hand that is very far from a declaration that the decision which the court actually reached was unwarranted, and therefore an abuse of its discretion."

The order appealed from is affirmed.

CLIFFORD v. UTT et al. (Civ. 4493.)

Vendor and purchaser ⚷21—Provisions of contract as to declaration of trust and possession held not sufficient to render contract enforceable.

A contract for the sale of land, providing for a declaration of trust to secure the deferred payments without any provision therein for the sale of the property on default and without any provision as to the possession of the property, was insufficient to be enforceable, where the evidence showed that it was not the intention of the parties to abide by the obligations which would be implied by law in the absence of such stipulations, but that it was intended those matters should be agreed upon by further negotiations.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Edgar A. Luce, Judge.

Action by Chas. E. Clifford against the Union Title Company of San Diego for money had and received, in which the defendant paid the money into court and had substituted, as defendants, Lewis John Utt and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Lewis J. Utt, Stephen Connell, and Sweet, Stearns & Forward, all of San Diego, for appellants.

Sample & Harden, of San Diego, and C. E. Spencer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment awarding to the plaintiff $2,500. Plaintiff began this action against the Union Title Company of San Diego, alleging that it had received from him said sum for his use and benefit; that plaintiff had demanded the return of said sum, which demand had been refused. The Union Title Company of San Diego, upon order of court, duly made upon motion of the defendant, deposited in court the amount of money in dispute, and Lewis John Utt and Sarah M. Utt were substituted as defendants. These substituted defendants filed an answer and cross-complaint, denying that the money was paid to the Union Title Company for the use and benefit of plaintiff, and alleging that it was paid as a part of the consideration to be paid by plaintiff for the purchase from the defendants of a certain tract of land situated in the county of San Diego, state of California, and known as "Agua Tibia" ranch, and that the sum so deposited was deposited by plaintiff, not for his own use and benefit, but for the use and benefit of the defendants. Defendants also alleged that the plaintiff had breached his contract with them for the purchase and sale of said ranch, and that they had suffered damage by reason of said breach in the sum of $16,500.

At the trial there was but one issue; i. e., whether or not the plaintiff had entered into a valid and enforceable contract for the purchase of the ranch. The contract relied upon by defendants consisted of a letter to the Union Title Company, written by plaintiff, inclosing a check for the $2,500 in dispute and an authorization to use the same "in connection with your order No. 93380" when said title company could issue its unlimited guarantee of title to the said ranch vested in Union Trust Company of San Diego. The said letter of plaintiff to Union Title Company then continues as follows:

> "Cause Trust Co. to issue declaration of trust to secure two notes aggregating $80,000; $10,000 due on or before Feb. 15, 1924, and $70,000 due on or before Feb. 15, 1926, with interest at 6% per annum, from Feb. 15, 1921, payable quarterly said notes to be in favor of Lewis John Utt and Mrs. Sarah M. Utt said notes may be divided so as to make four in place of two, to wit: 2 for $5,000.00 and 2 for $35,000.00, otherwise being the same and are to be signed by Charles E. Clifford and Nettie I. Clifford."

The letter from which the above quotation is made must be considered in connection with two other documents which, it is admitted, were also a part of the contract between the parties. One of these is a so-called memorandum to be attached to escrow instructions relative to sale of Agua Tibia Rancho, from L. J. Utt and Sarah M. Utt to Charles E. Clifford. Said memorandum reads, in part, as follows:

> "For reference it is agreed that the entire sale price is $100,000.00, of which sum $20,000.00 shall be paid before conclusion of the escrow; that the remainder shall be secured by the notes covering the property; $10,000.00 being payable on or before February 15, 1924, and the remaining $70,000 on or before February 15, 1926, bearing interest and otherwise according to the terms of said escrow instructions."

Then follows a description of the portion of the property to be known as the "House and Springs Tract," and a description of the portion to be known as "the Olive Orchard Tract," and provisions for the release of these tracts from the lien of the trust upon the payment of specified amounts. There are also provisions about releases of water rights, etc., that are not material to our inquiry here. This document is signed by L. J. Utt and Chas. E. Clifford.

The other document to be considered here as a part of the contract is a letter written to the Union Title Company, signed: "Lewis John Utt" and "Sarah M. Utt, by Lewis J. Utt, Agent," which reads in part as follows:

> "I will hand you a deed executed by myself and wife, Florence G. Utt and Sarah M. Utt to Union Trust Co. of San Diego, of the property hereinafter described and also to include all water and water rights appurtenant thereto which you are authorized to use in connection with your order No. 93380 when you can issue your unlimited guarantee of title * * * in your usual form on lands known as Agua Tibia Ranch, which will show that the title to said property is vested in Union Trust Co. of San Diego. * * * Cause Trust Co. to issue trust to secure 4 notes by Chas. E. and Nettie I. Clifford, 2 of said notes to be for $5,000.00 each due on or before Feb. 15, 1924, and 2 of said notes to be for $35,000.00 each due on or before Feb. 15, 1926, and all drawing interest at 6% per annum payable quarterly, one $5,000.00 and 1 $35,000.00 note being payable to Sarah M. Utt and others to me. * * * Deliver guarantee to Trust Co.
> "Additional instructions: Collect $20,000.00 for account of Sarah M. Utt and myself and pay off present mortgage and interest and 2nd half of State and County Taxes 1920–21. Place $100.00 stamp on deed. * * *"

The trial court held that the foregoing instruments, considered together, were so ambiguous as not to constitute a valid and enforceable contract, and particularly so in regard to the terms of the declaration of trust to be made by the trust company. It was held by the trial court that many of the terms and conditions of said trust declaration had been left undetermined between the parties, to be settled between them by future negotiations, and, as such terms and conditions were never agreed upon, no contract between the parties was ever consummated. This ruling was made over the objection and contention of defendants that the contract was sufficiently certain and definite to be enforceable, and that any provisions necessary for the enforcement or carrying out of the purposes of the trust, which were not specifically agreed upon in the writings herein set out, would be implied by law.

The reasoning of the trial court was to the effect that if the Union Trust Company made a declaration of trust, holding the property to secure notes evidencing the unpaid balance of the purchase price, and then in trust for Clifford, such declaration of trust, in accordance with the terms of the documents constituting the contract between the parties, would not contain a provision giving to the trustee the power of sale upon default in the payment of the notes or interest, nor would it contain any provision for the possession of the property or the accumulation of the rents and profits, nor for the costs and expenses of the trust and the trustee, nor for the attorney's fees in case of a suit upon the notes or foreclosure of the declaration of trust, or for the payment of taxes. Conceding that strict compliance with the terms of the contract would result in a declaration of trust, which might be enforced in equity, regardless of the absence of provisions for its own enforcement by sale, etc., nevertheless, such a declaration of trust would not be the one intended by the parties. While certain provisions of a contract may be supplied by implication of law, there are no implications of law with reference to provisions that the parties intended themselves to agree upon later.

Particular stress is placed by the trial court upon the proposition that in the absence of such an agreement in a declaration of trust, the trustee in case of default would not have the power to sell the trust property and it would be necessary for the trustee to bring an action in equity to enforce the trust and to have the rights under the contract determined, instead of the proceeding usually provided for in a trust declaration upon default, giving to the trustee the power of sale upon proper notice without resorting to a suit in equity. Perry on Trusts, §§ 602b, 602c, 602d. The trial court concluded upon all the evidence that the parties intended to embody in the trust declaration a provision for sale by trustee in event of default, as well as other provisions to be agreed upon and settled between the parties. This conclusion is reinforced by what the parties actually did, the defendants presenting to the plaintiff for his acceptance an elaborate declaration of trust providing for sale in the event of default and for many other matters not provided for in the preliminary documents signed by the parties. This would seem to indicate that it was not their intention to rely upon the remedy furnished by law in the absence of special agreement.

The trial court was also influenced in its judgment by the fact that no provision for the possession of the property was made in the agreement between the parties. Appellant argues very convincingly that no provision was necessary upon this matter; that the possession would follow the legal title and is merely an incident of title and need not be specifically mentioned. This would be true, of course, if it had been intended by the parties that the right to possession should be determined by law and not by contract; but, as the trial court pointed out, other provisions of the contract—such as the provisions for the payment of taxes, insurance, upkeep, etc., as well as the provisions regarding possession by Clifford contained in the trust agreement later submitted to plaintiff for his approval—all indicate that the parties intended to agree definitely upon the possession and not to allow it to follow the title as a mere incident, and this we conceive to be the crux of the case. The trial court concluded, from all the evidence, including the evidence of the documents relied upon by defendants, that the parties did not intend to leave to implication of law provisions regarding numerous matters which they had not put in writing at the time their agreement was signed, but intended to arrive at an agreement regarding such matters at a later date. As to these matters, they never consummated an agreement, and their contract with reference to the entire subject-matter, therefore, was incomplete and unenforceable. As pointed out by the trial court, the parties continued to negotiate after the signing of the agreement relied upon here, as is evidenced by the fact that the Utts approved a certain declaration of trust containing provisions not mentioned in the earlier agreement and not implied by law, and submitted said declaration of trust to Clifford for his approval.

There are no other matters requiring discussion, and the judgment is affirmed.

Judgment ⚷460(3)—Complaint held not to show "accident, surprise, or excusable neglect" as ground for setting aside default judgment.

A complaint to vacate a default judgment foreclosing a mortgage which did not charge defendant with any fraud whereby plaintiff was prevented from defending, but merely alleged that the mortgage had been transferred to defendant by plaintiff's partner to whom it was executed for a different purpose and that plaintiff failed to defend the foreclosure action because he relied upon his partner's assurance that he would pay the mortgage, does not show accident, surprise, or excusable neglect entitling plaintiff to have the foreclosure judgment vacated.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against him entered upon an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend.

The action was brought to set aside a judgment rendered against the appellant upon his default. According to the allegations of the complaint, the plaintiff, Charles W. Fisher, and one W. C. Walker, were partners in the real estate business. Fisher had confidence and faith in the integrity of Walker, and on November 10, 1915, plaintiff and Walker entered into a contract for the purchase of certain real estate, and, for the purpose of furnishing credit to Walker, plaintiff executed and delivered to him his promissory note for $3,000, secured by a mortgage upon real property owned by plaintiff. This transaction did not relate to the partnership business. On March 31, 1919, Walker assigned said note and mortgage to the defendants herein for a valuable consideration. The assignment was not made for the purpose for which the mortgage was executed, but was for Walker's own benefit, and was made without the consent and against the intention of plaintiff. Thereafter the defendants foreclosed the mortgage, making the present plaintiff a defendant in the foreclosure suit. The present plaintiff was served with summons in said foreclosure suit, and thereupon informed Walker of what had occurred and was assured by Walker that he (Walker) would discharge the mortgage and save the present plaintiff harmless. Said plaintiff, having full confidence in Walker, neglected to appear and defend in the foreclosure suit; Walker failed to discharge the mortgage, and on December 17, 1920, judgment was taken against the present plaintiff, by default, in said foreclosure suit. Plaintiff was first informed of this fact in December, 1921.

Demurrer was interposed upon the ground that the complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The order of the trial court sustaining the demurrer recited that plaintiff had stated in his brief filed with the court that no attempt had been made to charge fraud in the complaint.

No fraud being alleged against the defendants, it is difficult to see how they can be held responsible for the negligence of plaintiff in trusting to Walker after he had betrayed his confidence, and in making no attempt whatever to protect his rights after he had been duly served with summons in the action. As stated in the case of Amestoy

Estate Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 5 Cal. App. 273, 276, 90 Pac. 42, 44:

> "There is no suggestion in the complaint that plaintiff was prevented by any act of the defendant from appearing and making a proper defense."

It was pointed out in said last-cited case that the selection of an attorney upon whose advice plaintiff acted was not induced by any act of the defendants. Also, in the present case, plaintiff's reliance upon his partner was not chargeable in any manner to the defendants.

We think the facts alleged do not show accident, surprise, or excusable neglect such as would justify a court of equity in interfering with a judgment obtained against the present plaintiff after personal service of summons.

> "There is a marked distinction between the powers of the court in the first instance, wherein discretion is given to the court to relieve a party from a mistake, fraud, or from excusable neglect, under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, and those powers exercised by a court of equity after the lapse of such time when proceedings are instituted by an original bill to vacate the judgment of another court." Amestoy Estate Co. v. City of Los Angeles, supra.

Furthermore, it is fundamental that, in order to entitle the plaintiff to the relief he prays, plaintiff must allege facts which demonstrate that he has a good defense to the action on the merits. This has not been done in the present case; on the contrary, plaintiff has stated facts and circumstances which certainly raise a question of estoppel as against an innocent purchaser for value, without notice, who has been guilty of no fraud or misconduct. Assuredly, it cannot be said, as a matter of law, upon the facts stated, that the plaintiff was not guilty of such carelessness of the rights of a possible innocent purchaser as to preclude him from asserting any equities against such an one, and therefore the complaint does not allege a good defense on the merits.

The judgment is affirmed.

Opinion of the Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. In denying the petition for a hearing by this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal, we do not approve what is said in the last paragraph of the opinion of that court.

The judgment of the trial court herein was properly affirmed on the ground that the complaint fails to state facts showing such fraud, mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect as to justify the interposition of a court of equity for the purpose of setting aside a judgment.

The petition is denied.

CLAUSSEN v. NEWTON.

THOMAS v. SAME.

(Civ. 4544.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 7, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 6, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error ⟹1010(2)—Judgment unsupported by evidence cannot be sustained.

In an action on promissory note, where all the evidence and the only evidence sustains the allegations of the complaint that the note was unpaid, a finding that it has been fully paid and judgment for defendant cannot be sustained.

2. Master and servant ⟹80(9)—Recovery for services warranted by evidence.

In an action for services as salesman, evidence held sufficient to entitle him to a judgment.

Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Two actions, one by Helen Claussen, a minor, by Sophie Thomas, guardian ad litem, against John Newton, doing business under the fictitious name of Pacific Body Works, and one by Adolph Thomas against the same defendant, tried together. From judgments for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Judgments reversed.

Chalmer Munday, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Harry I. Stafford, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. These two cases were tried together upon the same evidence, and though separate appeals were filed, are submitted upon the same record. The first case of Helen Claussen v. John Newton was on a promissory note for $500. The trial court found that the note was executed and delivered in accordance with the allegations of the complaint. It also found that said note, together with all interest thereon, had been fully paid, and entered judgment for the defendant.

[1] The whole attack upon this judgment is that the finding of payment is not supported by the evidence. A review of the evidence discloses that all that was offered in the case showed conclusively that the note was not paid. There was some evidence of doubtful merit that, at some time during the business relations of the respondent and Adolph Thomas, the plaintiff in the second case, a payment was made by this respondent to Thomas in the sum of $1,060 on "trade acceptance and a note." There was no attempt to connect this testimony with the payment of the note in suit, and the respondent cites no evidence to sustain the finding and presents no argument in support of the judgment. The case presented, therefore, is one in which all the evidence, and the only evidence sustains the allegations of the complaint that the note was unpaid. The judgment, therefore, must be reversed.

[2] In the second case, Adolph Thomas sued John Newton on a common count for money for services rendered in the sum of $3,939.49. An amendment to the complaint was filed setting up a second cause of action in which it was alleged that on the 19th day of June, 1919, this plaintiff and the defendant entered into an agreement of copartnership for the conduct of a business in the city and county of San Francisco wherein they agreed to participate in the profits of said business, share and share alike. The prayer followed for an accounting of said partnership, and the recovery of the amount found to be due from the defendant. The trial court found that these allegations of the complaint and the amendment thereto were not true, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendant. As in the other case, the appeal is based upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support these findings.

The appellant testified, and on this appeal respondent concedes, that on April 15, 1918, the appellant entered into the employment of the respondent as a salesman or solicitor for him on the agreement that he was to receive as compensation therefor the sum of $15 per week, which was to cover the first $200 worth of business procured by him each week, together with a commission of 5 per cent. on all further business procured by him, and expenses. The appellant testified that this agreement terminated about June 19, 1919, and the partnership agreement was thereupon made. Respondent contends that no partnership was formed, but that the appellant continued in the employ of the respondent under the agreement of April 15, 1918, until July 20, 1920. The only evidence on the question of the formation of the partnership is the direct and positive testimony of the appellant that such a partnership was formed, and that the parties continued to act under it until the breach on July 20, 1920. The only evidence of any kind covering the terms under which the parties were working was the testimony of the appellant to the effect that from June 19, 1919, to July 20, 1920, he worked under an express agreement to divide the profits 50-50. In support of the finding of the trial court that no partnership had been formed the respondent relied upon the inferences which he contends the trial court was justified in drawing from other circumstances.

Passing the question of the formation of the partnership and directing our attention to the suit for the recovery of money due under the common count, respondent concedes that during the period of their business relations the gross revenue from the business was the sum of $119,346.13. He then deducts from this total the sum of $23,600, which represents the revenue estimated on the basis of $200 per week for the period of 218 weeks, upon which no commission was payable. He then gives the sum of $95,746.13 as the gross revenue upon which appellant was entitled to a commission of 5 per cent. amounting to $4,787.30. The payment of $15 per week for the period of 118 weeks is conceded to be $1,770. The total of these two sums is $6,557.30, to which appellant would be entitled for the entire period under respondent's theory of the case. (Through a mathematical error, the respondent gives this figure as $6,478.81.) The respondent then contends that the appellant actually received the sum of $6,346.62 for his services during this period. In arriving at the amount of the gross revenue of the business, respondent takes the amount shown by deposit of money in the bank only and omits therefrom all mention of cash actually received and divided between the parties at various times during the period of employment. He also omits the amount of business on hand on July 20, 1920, which was shown to be $4,000. Thus, upon the case made out by respondent, the appellant was entitled to a judgment in some amount.

These calculations are all made on the basis of respondent's theory that the appellant was to receive 5 per cent. commission on the gross business of the concern throughout the entire period of employment. But the only evidence offered was that this arrangement was for 5 per cent. commission and expenses, and that this was changed by mutual consent on June 19, 1919, so that appellant was to receive 50 per cent. of the net profits instead of 5 per cent. of the gross. Having proved the agreement by uncontradicted evidence, appellant was entitled to an accounting to determine the net profits. If it should then appear that he had received less than his proportionate share of these profits, he would be entitled to a judgment for the difference.

Judgment reversed.

BEST et al. v. TOPRAHANIAN. (Civ. 3818.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 12, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷931(1)—Findings of lower court presumed sustained by sufficient evidence.

On appeal, the findings of the lower court are presumed to be sustained by sufficient evidence.

2. Appeal and error ⚷907(3)—In absence of typewritten abstract or bill of exceptions in printed abstract, findings cannot be held unsupported by evidence.

Where appellant has not brought up a typewritten transcript of the evidence as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a–953c, and where the printed transcript contains no bill of exceptions showing what evidence was presented to the lower court, the appellate court is unwarranted in holding that the findings are not justified by the evidence, notwithstanding a stipulation that the printed record contains true copies of plaintiffs' and defendant's exhibits, there being no showing that other evidence was not deduced.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Action by W. H. Best and others, doing business under the firm name and style of Best, DeBlois & Covington, against A. Toprahanian. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. N. Dyke, of Imperial, for appellant.

Sebille & Sebille, of Brawley, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Plaintiffs, licensed real estate brokers, averring that they had been employed by defendant to find for him a purchaser of his real property, brought this action to recover their commission, alleging that they had found a buyer who was ready, willing, and able to purchase the property. Plaintiffs recovered judgment, and defendant has appealed.

The case comes here upon a printed transcript which contains no copy of any bill of exceptions. No attempt has been made by appellant to avail himself of the alternative method of presenting a record on appeal by causing a typewritten transcript of the evidence to be brought up in lieu of a bill of exceptions, as he might have done under sections 953a–953c of the Code of Civil Procedure. The printed transcript, besides containing a copy of the judgment roll, contains copies of certain documents which, on their face, would seem to be exhibits introduced in the court below during the trial of the action. At the end of the transcript is a stipulation, signed by counsel for the respective parties, stipulating that the transcript contains true copies of the judgment roll and "plaintiffs' and defendant's exhibits."

[1, 2] Appellant's sole point is that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain certain of the findings made by the trial court. Appellant, on the record before us, is not in a position to attack the findings. The presumption in this court is that the findings are sustained by sufficient evidence, and the burden is upon appellant to show that the decision of the court below is erroneous. This can be done only by a duly authenticated record of the evidence. Since appellant has not brought up a typewritten transcript of the evidence, and, since the printed transcript contains no bill of exceptions showing what evidence was presented to the lower court, we are unable to say that the findings are not fully justified by evidence sufficient and competent for the purpose. The printed record does, it is true, set forth the stipulation that the transcript contains true copies of "plaintiffs' and defendant's exhibits," but there is nothing to show that other evidence was not adduced at the trial. Since every intendment must be indulged in support of the action of the trial court, it must be presumed, in the absence of an affirmative showing to the contrary, that there was other evidence besides the exhibits to support the decision. We are not at liberty to disturb the judgment in the absence of a record sufficient to enable appellant properly to present the only point made by him.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by William S. Dennis, as administrator of the estate of Easter Belle Stewart, deceased, against Eldora Brown, executrix of the last will and testament of James Brown, deceased, wherein Robert W. Dennis was substituted as plaintiff and administrator of the estate of Easter Belle Stewart, deceased. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Lermen and G. K. Burgren, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

B. M. Aikins, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an action on a promissory note for $10,000 and interest brought by the administrator of the estate of Easter Belle Stewart, deceased, against the estate of her father, James Brown, deceased. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

The defendant Eldora Brown is the widow of James Brown, who was the father of Easter Belle Stewart by a former marriage. Easter Belle Stewart died intestate November 25, 1918, in Spokane, Wash., where she resided with her husband, Neil Stewart. About four months later, on March 21, 1919, her father, James Brown, died in San Francisco, where he resided with his wife, Eldora Brown. He left a will in which he named his wife executrix, and divided his property, share and share alike, between her and a son by his former marriage. Ten days after the death of James Brown, Neil Stewart, as surviving husband of Easter Belle Stewart, in writing, nominated the original plaintiff, William S. Dennis, as administrator of her estate, and requested the superior court at San Francisco to appoint him as such administrator. The application for letters named Neil Stewart and James Brown as the next of kin and heirs at law of Easter Belle Stewart. William S. Dennis died pending the appeal, and Robert Dennis was appointed administrator of Mrs. Stewart's estate and substituted as plaintiff in this action. Among the papers left by the deceased James Brown at his home, or in a wallet delivered by him to his wife about two weeks before his death, was the note in suit, dated February 1, 1918, signed by him and naming his daughter payee. With it was an explanatory letter to the daughter. This action was commenced after a claim therefor presented against the father's estate was rejected by the executrix. The issues presented by the pleadings are due execution and delivery of the note and want of consideration.

The note and explanatory letter were produced by defendant on the trial and introduced in evidence by plaintiff. This letter reads:

> "My Dear Easterbelle: The inclosed note is to represent value of twenty five hundred ($500) dollar bonds of the California Paper & Board Mills which I set aside for you when they were issued but which I was never able to give you as I used them as security for money I borrowed but they were redeemed February 1st, 1918, and instead of cash I am giving you a note as I still need the money.
> "Your loving father, James Brown."

Plaintiff also put in evidence a letter which James Brown wrote to his daughter addressed to her at Spokane, April 14, 1918, containing the following:

> "I put a note for 10,000.00 (ten thousand) dollars in your name Easter Belle Stewart in the Safe Deposit Box and a note explaining it was for 20 bonds of the Cal. Paper & Board Mills which I sold on Feby. 1st and that these were yours but on a/c of using them as collateral for borrowed money I had not been able till then to turn over to you and I am still needing the money so this note which calls for 6 per cent. int. is in place of it for the present and is dated Feby. 1, 1918 so you understand it."

The trial court found that James Brown, deceased, never made, executed, and delivered to Easter Belle Stewart either on the 1st day of February, 1918, or at any other time, the promissory note in suit, or any promissory note, and never promised or agreed to pay her the sum of $10,000, or any other sum; also, that said James Brown never received any consideration of any character whatsoever from Easter Belle Stewart for said promissory note.

It was the theory of plaintiff on the trial of the action, as indicated by his opening statement, that James Brown deposited this note in a safe deposit box in the vaults of the Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank (which was rented in his daughter's name with himself as deputy) in lieu of $10,000 worth of bonds which he had previously given as a gift to his daughter; that the bonds constituted the consideration for the note; and that the deposit of the note in the safe deposit box constituted a delivery to Easter Belle Stewart. In support of his case plaintiff's counsel questioned Neil Stewart concerning matters occurring prior to James Brown's death. Defendant objected on the ground that the witness could not testify by reason of the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The trial court sustained the objection and refused to permit Stewart to testify regarding such matters.

Appellant contends that this ruling constituted prejudicial error. Also, that the evidence produced shows a delivery of the promissory note and that there was a valid consideration therefor.

[1] As to the first point, section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

> "The following persons cannot be witnesses: * * * (3) Parties or assignors of parties to an action or proceeding, or persons in whose behalf an action or proceeding is prosecuted, against an executor or administrator upon a claim, or demand against the estate of a deceased person, as to any matter or fact occurring before the death of such deceased person."

We think Stewart quite clearly came within the excluded class as a person "in whose behalf" the action was being prosecuted. Upon the death of Easter Belle Stewart, intestate, title to all her property, both real and personal, immediately vested in Neil Stewart and James Brown, as her heirs, subject only to the control of the probate court and to the possession of the administrator for purposes of administration. Civ. Code, § 1384. Letters of administration of the estate of Easter Belle Stewart were issued to William S. Dennis, the original plaintiff herein, as the nominee and at the request of Neil Stewart, the surviving husband of deceased. The test seems to be whether or not the witness's interest in the claim amounts to an existing property right. "An action against an executor or administrator on a claim against a deceased person is one brought 'on behalf of' any person not a party to the action who, nevertheless, has an existing property right in the claim." Badover v. Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank, 186 Cal. 775, 781, 200 Pac. 638, 640; Uhlhorn v. Goodman, 84 Cal. 185, 192, 23 Pac. 1114. As before observed, Neil Stewart had a vested interest—an existing property right (Brenham v. Story, 39 Cal. 179, 188; Smith v. Olmstead, 88 Cal. 582, 586, 26 Pac. 521, 12 L. R. A. 46, 22 Am. St. Rep. 336; Phelan v. Dunne, 72 Cal. 229, 13 Pac. 662), and the trial court properly excluded the testimony objected to.

[2] As to delivery of the note in suit and consideration therefor, appellant argues that the statements contained in the father's letter to his daughter that he had deposited the note in the safe deposit box conclusively proved that fact; that such a deposit constituted a delivery to Mrs. Stewart, and the note being in writing, a consideration would be presumed; and, further, that the evidence showed certain bonds constituted the consideration.

There is sufficient evidence in the record to support a finding that the note had been delivered and that a valuable consideration had passed if the trial court had desired to make such a finding. There is also some evidence to support the finding to the contrary which the trial court did make, and under repeated rulings of the Supreme Court this is sufficient to support the finding.

Judgment affirmed.

SCOTT, MAGNER & MILLER v. MOZZETTI.
(Civ. 4432.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 15, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑931(1) — Appellate court must assume that trial court accepted plaintiff's testimony on appeal by defendant.

Where the evidence as to the value of certain goods was conflicting, the appellate court, on an appeal by the defendant, must assume, in support of the judgment, that the trial court accepted the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses.

2. Sales 🔑187—Allowance of interest prior to date of judgment in action for goods sold and delivered held error.

In seller's action for goods sold and delivered, in which the buyer claimed that the seller was entitled merely to the reasonable value of the goods, as against seller's contention that he was entitled to the price as provided in a contract, which contract did not provide for the payment of interest on deferred payments, allowance of interest prior to rendition of judgment was error, since under either theory interest should not have been included before the date of the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Scott, Magner & Miller, a corporation, against Ben Mozzetti. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Wm. P. Caubu, of San Francisco, for appellant.

A. A. Sanderson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. [1] The plaintiff commenced an action to recover a judgment for merchandise sold and delivered. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed. The plaintiff was, prior to July 1, 1920, engaged in the business of dealing in stock feed at wholesale. The defendant was a dairyman and purchased large quantities of hay of the plaintiff. In some years the purchases ran as high as $40,000. During the season of 1920 the plaintiff commenced to close up its affairs and go out of business. A difference having arisen between the plaintiff and the defendant, the plaintiff commenced its action by filing a complaint, the charging part of which is:

> "That the said defendant, Ben Mozzetti, is indebted to the plaintiff above named in the sum of $1,925.50 for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant at the special instance and request of said defendant, at the said city and county of San Francisco, state of California, together with the interest accrued on said sale, and for which the said defendant promised and agreed to pay to said plaintiff at said city and county of San Francisco, state aforesaid, said sum of $1,925.50."

Later the plaintiff filed an amended complaint which is identical with the original complaint, except that it claims $2,940.16 instead of $1,925.50. Thereafter the defendant filed an answer which denied the material allegations of the plaintiff's complaint and contained an allegation as follows:

> "That on or about the 19th day of May, 1920, said defendant agreed with said plaintiff to purchase a certain boat load of first-class, first-cut alfalfa hay and to pay therefor the sum of $32 per ton; that delivery was made by said plaintiff of alfalfa hay from what was known as the Enos Ranch; that delivery was made to the said defendant of a certain lot of hay which was not first-class and first-cut alfalfa hay from said Enos Ranch; that said defendant objected to the said delivery and refused to accept the said boat load of hay, and that following such refusal said plaintiff agreed with said defendant that, upon the acceptance of said hay by said defendant, said defendant should pay what was the reasonable value of the said hay; that said defendant agreed so to do; that the reasonable value of the said hay was $15 per ton and said defendant has offered and is now and has always been willing to pay for such hay at the rate of $15 per ton; that said plaintiff has refused to accept such payment."

On the issues so made the parties went to trial. The plaintiff took up the burden of proof and called five witnesses to the stand. It called Mr. Hyde, the plaintiff's bookkeeper, and by him elicited the proof that the books showed a balance of account in the sum of $2,940.16. By Mr. Miller, the plaintiff's manager, the plaintiff proved that on the 19th day of May, 1920, Mr. T. J. Code, acting for the plaintiff, entered into a contract with the defendant as follows:

> "May 19, 1920. This is to certify that Scott, Magner & Miller have sold the named lots of alfalfa: Tony Valine, 160 tons at 32½, Guadalupe Wharf, or So. San Francisco. A. T. Nunes, 70 tons at 32.50, same delivery. Alamo Bros., 100 tons at 32.50, same delivery. Three boat loads of the Enos hay, first lot at 32.00, Cabu's barn. [Signed] T. J. Code, Ben Mozzetti."

The plaintiff, continuing the burden of proof, introduced evidence to the effect that hay from the Enos Ranch arrived on the schooner Thomas; that there was in the load 105.4 tons; that of that quantity 50 per cent. of the bales contained foxtail or other foul material; that the amount of the foul material was 10 to 15 per cent. and that hay of that quality was, according to the varying testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses, worth $26 to $27.50 per ton. The defendant introduced testimony that the value was much less, but in support of the judgment we must assume that the trial court believed the plaintiff's witnesses were more nearly correct, and that the trial court accepted the highest price stated by those witnesses. So assuming, the case stands thus: The total amount of the hay in question was 105.4 tons; 50 per cent. thereof would be 52.7 tons; that quantity should have been charged at $27.50 per ton, whereas it was charged at $32 per ton, or, in other words, at a price $4.50 per ton too high. The overcharge on 52.7 tons was $237.15.

[2] The book account included a charge for interest, which item, according to the testimony of the bookkeeper, was computed down to December 31, 1920, and amounted to $956.88. That item was improperly inserted for two different reasons. The written contract made by the plaintiff's agent and the defendant did not call for the payment of interest on deferred payments. In the next place, the theory of the plaintiff in presenting its case was that the plaintiff was not entitled to the contract price, but was entitled to the reasonable value of the cargo of hay that was shipped on the schooner Thomas. That reasonable value was not ascertained until the judgment was rendered. Interest should not have been included before the date of the judgment. It therefore appears that the defendant was overcharged $237.15 on the defective hay and $956.88 as interest, making $1,194.03 in all. As the judgment of the trial court was for the total sum claimed, the judgment should be reduced $1,194.03. But the trial court, in ruling on the motion for a new trial, reduced its own judgment $500; therefore the present judgment stands of record for $2,440.16, whereas there should be deducted the further sum of $694.03, leaving it stand for the sum of $1,746.13.

The judgment is modified accordingly, and as so modified the same is affirmed. And it is further ordered that the appellant recover his costs.

A widow is put to her election where she would receive, if she took under the will, something to which she would not otherwise be entitled as community owner.

3. Wills 🔑439—Testator's intent controlling.

The intention of the testator controls the construction of a will.

4. Wills 🔑487(1)—Testator presumed not to have included wife's share of community property.

In the absence of a manifest intent on the part of testator, it will not be presumed that he designed to devise or bequeath his wife's share of community property or other property of which he had no power of testamentary disposition.

5. Wills 🔑800—Wife's acceptance of devise confirmation of testamentary disposition of her share of community property.

Where testator's manifest intent was to dispose of his wife's share of community property as well as his own share, if the widow accepts a legacy or devise under the will, such acceptance must be held to be a confirmation of the disposition of the will.

6. Wills 🔑781—Testator's bequest by specific description of property in which he had only undivided interest requires election.

Where a testator uses words of specific description in disposing of property in which he has only an undivided limited or conditional interest, the necessity for election arises, it not being presumed as in the case where he uses general words, such as "all my lands" or "all my estate," that he intended to dispose of his individual interest only.

7. Wills 🔑782(2)—Testator's knowledge or mistake as to his ownership immaterial in determining necessity of election.

That testator mistakenly believed he had unrestricted testamentary power of disposition over community property is not material in determining whether his widow is put to an election, nor is it material that he knew that he had no title or right to dispose of her share, if his intention to devise it as an entirety is manifest.

8. Wills 🔑782(2)—Devise of community property held to necessitate widow's election.

A devise of a lot, specifically described with the improvements thereon, to testator's sister, made necessary an election by testator's widow, where the property so devised was community property, and the widow could not take both the devises under the will and her community interest in the property devised to the sister.

9. Wills 🔑793—Stipulation of election to take under will binding on widow.

A written stipulation entered into prior to the entry of a decree of distribution, but after the court had indicated his decision, that, if it should be determined that testator's widow was put to an election, she should be deemed to have elected to take under the will, constituted an election to take under the will binding on her on a reversal of the trial court's finding that she was not required to elect.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Proceedings in the matter of the estate of James C. Moore, deceased. From the decree of final distribution, Mary J. S. Moore, individually and as executrix, appeals. Modified and affirmed.

William Hazlett and Merton A. Albee, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Simpson & Simpson, of Pasadena, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Mary J. S. Moore, the sister of James C. Moore, deceased, appeals from that part of the decree of final distribution which distributes to her an undivided one-half of, instead of the whole estate in, that certain parcel of land which is situated in the city of Los Angeles and which for convenience will be referred to herein as the "Ceres avenue property."

The lower court found that all of the decedent's estate was community property. One of the questions presented for decision, and the one upon which this appeal will be decided, is whether under the terms of the will the widow, Mollie C. H. Moore, was entitled to take the one-half of the community property which devolved upon her by law and in addition thereto her interest in the other moiety thereof as given to her by the will, or whether she was put to an election between the provisions of the will and of the law in respect to such property. The lower court held that the widow was not required to elect, and distributed to her not only the undivided one-half which devolved upon her under the statute but also the interest in the other moiety which the will gave to her.

James C. Moore died July 8, 1919, leaving an estate consisting of eight parcels of land in the city of Pasadena and the Ceres avenue property in the city of Los Angeles. He was a resident of the county of Los Angeles continuously from 1903 to the time of his death. By his last will, executed May 18, 1919, he devised the Ceres avenue property to his sister, the appellant here, and all the rest and remainder of his property to his wife and his six children. The only provisions of the will which we need notice in our present inquiry are the following:

> "II. I give, devise and bequeath to my beloved sister Mary J. S. Moore, of Los Angeles, California, all of lot No. five (No. 5) of E. M. Funk Subdivision of Valenzuela Tract in Los Angeles, California, with the improvements thereon, and known as the 714 Ceres Ave. property, and originally purchased by me out of a considerable sum of money coming out of my now deceased mother's property, and purchased as a home for her and to which she never received a properly recorded deed.
> "III. All the rest and residue, and any remainder of my estate, both real and personal, wherever situated and of which I die seized or possessed, or to which I may be entitled at the time of my decease, I give, devise and bequeath as follows: One-half (½) thereof to my beloved wife Mollie C. H. Moore, and the remaining one-half (½) thereof I give, devise and bequeath to my beloved sons and daughters, Hester Elizabeth Armstrong, Zephyr A. Moore, Pleasant Ruth Moore, Jas. C. Moore, Jr., Paul J. Moore, and Miriam H. Moore, to be divided and shared among them according to their merits, needs and several abilities to rightly use the same."

Decedent and the respondent, Mollie C. H. Moore were married at Knoxville, Tenn., in 1890, where decedent's mother, Elizabeth Moore, owned a home. The newly married couple lived for a while with decedent's mother, until James bought a home of his own in Knoxville. On August 4, 1903, and before moving to Los Angeles, decedent purchased the Ceres avenue property for the sum of $3,000. The purchase price was paid in installments. The final payment, amounting to $957.89, was not made until some time in 1913. Before the property was fully paid for, namely, on March 4, 1907, James C. Moore received from his vendors a deed to the Ceres avenue property. His mother and sister came to Los Angeles in 1902, and shortly after the purchase of the Ceres avenue property in 1903 they made that their home until the mother's death in 1909. Thereafter it was occupied by the sister. James and his wife, after coming to California, resided in Pasadena. The Ceres avenue property seems to have been purchased in part from the proceeds of the sale or mortgage of the mother's property in Knoxville, in part from the proceeds of the sale or mortgage of the son's Knoxville property, and in part from the latter's earnings acquired subsequent to the time when he and his wife moved to Los Angeles county and took up their domicile in this state.

It would seem that James C. Moore intended that the Ceres avenue property should be purchased for and regarded as the property of his mother, to be occupied by her and his sister as their home. Indeed, by a written assignment dated March 22, 1904, he transferred to his mother his contract to purchase this property. His wife joined him in making this assignment to the mother. It recites a consideration of "one dollar, with divers other considerations." Later the son deeded the property to his mother by a deed dated April 5, 1907. His wife did not join with him in the execution of this deed, nor was that instrument ever recorded. Notwithstanding the assignment to the mother of the contract of purchase and the son's execution of the unrecorded deed to his mother, the Ceres avenue property has been treated by the parties to this litigation as a part of the son's estate. It was inventoried as a part of his estate; it is described as a part of his estate in respondent's petition for distribution; and appellant, in her written objection to the petition for distribution and also in a certain written stipulation entered into by her in the course of the trial, treats the property as a part of her brother's estate. Therefore the assignment of the contract and the deed to the mother, if they may be considered in the present proceeding for any purpose whatever, are relevant only in so far as they may have a tendency to show that James C. Moore considered that such interest as he had in the Ceres avenue lot was his own separate property and not the property of the community. Indeed, by a previous will, executed May 26, 1911, which was after his mother's death, Mr. Moore devised the Ceres avenue property to his sister by a clause which reads as follows:

> "I will my non-community property—one house and lot at what is now 714 Ceres avenue—to my sister Mary J. S. Moore." (Italics ours.)

The only reason for adverting to these facts is that they are circumstances tending to explain why it was that the testator used the language which he employed when devising the Ceres avenue property to his sister by his last will. They shed some light upon the question whether it was his intention to devise to his sister all the estate in the lot or only a moiety thereof; and under the doctrine of election the testator's intention is the crux of the problem, in so far at least as the case must turn upon the interpretation to be placed upon the testator's will.

Having found that all of the estate of James C. Moore, including the Ceres avenue property, was community property, and having concluded that the widow was not put to her election, the trial court distributed the estate as follows: To the sister, the appellant here, an undivided one-half of the Ceres avenue property; to the widow, as her part of the community property passing to her by operation of law, an undivided one-half of all of the property belonging to decedent's estate, including an undivided one-half of the Ceres avenue property; to the widow, under the will and in addition to the undivided one-half coming to her by operation of law, an undivided one-fourth of all of the property other than the Ceres avenue property; and to the six children, in equal shares, the remaining undivided one-fourth of all the property other than the Ceres avenue property, the same to be held in trust for them by their mother under a trust clause of the will which we have not deemed it necessary to set forth.

It will be noticed that the widow received under the will, in addition to her statutory community interest in the Pasadena lots, one-half of the remaining undivided half of those lots. That is, by taking under the will she was entitled to receive, and there was in fact distributed to her, an undivided three-fourths of those properties. These parcels of land in Pasadena formed a very considerable bulk of the deceased husband's estate; and from the fact that the widow entered into a certain stipulation referred to in the latter part of this opinion it would seem that she deemed an undivided three-fourths interest in the Pasadena lots to have a greater value than would be possessed by her mere statutory community undivided half interest in all the property of the estate.

As we have stated, appellant appeals from that part of the decree of distribution which distributes to her but an undivided one-half of, instead of all of the estate in, the Ceres avenue property. Her principal points on this appeal are: (1) That the evidence does not support the finding that the Ceres avenue property was community property; and (2) that if that property did belong to the community the widow was put to her election; that the latter elected to take under the will, and that therefore she may not now assert her statutory right to an undivided one-half of the Ceres avenue property, but that all of the estate therein should have been distributed to appellant under the will. We do not find it necessary to consider the first point; i. e., whether the evidence supports the finding that the Ceres avenue lot was community property, for we think that if that parcel of land was, as found by the lower court, the common property of the spouses, the will of James C. Moore, in so far as it makes a devise of the Ceres avenue property to his sister, was one whose terms forced an election upon the widow, and that the latter has made her election to take under the will.

[1, 2] The doctrine of election rests upon the equitable ground that no man can be permitted to claim inconsistent rights with regard to the same subject, and that any one who asserts an interest under an instrument is bound to give full effect, so far as he can, to that instrument. Or, as it is sometimes expressed, he who accepts a benefit under a deed or will must adopt the contents of the whole instrument, conforming to all of its provisions and renouncing every right inconsistent with it. In testamentary law, election, says the court in Morrison v. Bowman, 29 Cal. 347, 348, citing Story's Equity Jurisprudence—

> "is the obligation imposed upon a party to choose between two inconsistent or alternative rights or claims in cases when there is a clear intention of the person from whom he derives one, that he should not enjoy both; * * * a person cannot accept the benefit intended for him and at the same time reject the will by asserting, in opposition to it, his own inconsistent proprietary rights."

A widow is put to her election where she would receive, if she took under the will, something which she would not otherwise be entitled to as community owner. Smith v. Butler, 85 Tex. 126, 19 S. W. 1083; Zinn v. Farmer (Tex. Civ. App.) 243 S. W. 523–526. That was the case here; for, by electing to take under the will, the widow received an undivided three-fourths of the Pasadena properties instead of only an undivided one-half thereof.

[3-5] Before looking to the particular language of the will let us notice some of the rules of law applicable to the construction of such instruments when the question of election is involved, always remembering that the intention of the testator is to be kept in view as the pole star in the construction or interpretation of his will. In the absence of a manifest intention on the testator's part, it will not be presumed that he designed to devise or bequeath any property over which he did not possess the power of testamentary disposition. Morrison v. Bowman, supra. Of two possible constructions, that which favors the conclusion that the testator was disposing only of his own moiety of the common property will be adopted. This, says the court in Re Smith, 108 Cal. 119, 40 Pac. 1037, is the scope of the doctrine in Silvey's Estate, 42 Cal. 210; In re Gwin, 77 Cal. 313, 19 Pac. 527; and In re Gilmore, 81 Cal. 240, 22 Pac. 655. But though an intention on the part of the husband to dispose by his will of his wife's share of the community property will not be readily inferred, and will never be inferred where the words of the gift may have their fair and natural import by applying them only to the one-half of the community which he has the power to dispose of by will, yet when from the terms of the will it appears that the testator did intend to dispose of his wife's share of the community property, as well as the undivided half which is subject to his testamentary power, then, if the widow accepts a legacy or devise under the will—which acceptance necessarily operates to give effect to the will as an entire disposition by the testator—such acceptance must, by the conditions on which it is founded, be held to be a confirmation of the dispositions of the will. Morrison v. Bowman, supra. The controlling question is the intention of the testator, as manifested by the language of his will; and if it clearly appears that he intended to dispose of his wife's as well as his own interest in the community property, his widow will be put to her election.

[6] The difficulty of ascertaining the testator's intent is generally, if not always, greater where he has a partial or limited interest in the property devised than where he undertakes to dispose of property in which he has no interest whatever. In the former case the presumption is that he intended to dispose of that which he might properly devise, and nothing more, and this presumption will always prevail unless the intention is clearly manifested by demonstration plain, or necessary implication, on the part of the testator to dispose of the whole estate. Where he has only a limited or conditional interest in the property which he affects to dispose of by will, as, for instance, where it is community property, and he uses general words in disposing of it, such as "all my estate," "all my lands," and the like, no question of election arises. In such cases the testator's language can have full effect when applied only to that share or interest of which he has the absolute power of disposal, and he will be presumed to have intended to give only that estate or interest which is thus subject to his testamentary power. Examples of such wills are to be found in the cases relied upon by respondent. In re Gilmore, supra; Estate of Silvey, supra; In re Wickersham, 138 Cal. 355, 70 Pac. 1076, 71 Pac 437; and In re Prager, 166 Cal. 450, 137 Pac. 37. But a wholly different question is presented where the testator, having a limited or partial interest in a particular piece of property, does not employ general words of description and donation, such as "all my estate," and the like, but describes the property specifically. In such case the language of the devise is such as is suitable to a disposition of the particular piece of property as an entirety. Thus in Penn v. Guggenheimer, 76 Va. 847, the court says:

> "Generally when the testator has an undivided interest in certain property, and he employs general words in disposing of it, as 'all my lands,' or 'all my estate,' no case of election arises from it; for it does not plainly appear that he meant to dispose of anything but what was strictly his own. 2 Story, E. J., § 1087; Pomeroy, § 489. A case of election does arise, however, when the testator, having an undivided or partial interest in an estate, devises it specifically, thus indicating a purpose to bestow it as an entirety. The rule on this subject is thus laid down in Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 489. Where the testator proposes to give the whole thing itself, using language which by reasonable intention, must necessarily describe and define, the whole corpus of the thing in which his particular interest exists as a distinct and identified piece of property, then an intention to bestow the whole, and not merely the testator's individual share, must be inferred, and a case for an election arises."

To the same effect are Smith v. Butler, supra; Skaggs v. Deskin (Tex. Civ. App.) 66 S. W. 793; Zinn v. Farmer, supra, and Pratt v. Douglas, 38 N. J. Eq. 516, 537, a case involving the doctrine of election under the community system obtaining in this state. See, also, Waggoner v. Waggoner, 111 Va. 325, 68 S. E. 990, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 644, and Ditch v. Sennott, 117 Ill. 362, 7 N. E. 636.

[7, 8] Let us now apply these principles to the case under consideration. The particular parcel of land devised to appellant is described specifically and as an entirety. The language of the will is: "I give and bequeath to my beloved sister * * * all of lot No. five," etc. This language is such as would be suitable in disposing of the whole property. The testator purports to give the whole thing itself, using language which, by reasonable interpretation, necessarily describes and defines, as a distinct and identified piece of property, the whole corpus of the thing in which his partial and testamentary interest exists. The language of this devise is ample, complete and correct for the purpose of disposing of the corpus of the lot and every estate therein, but is wholly inapplicable to a gift of a mere moiety. Not only this, but, by declaring in his will that the lot which he was devising to his sister "was originally purchased by me out of a considerable sum of money coming out of my now deceased mother's property, and purchased as a home for her," but to which "she never received a properly recorded deed," the testator clearly evidences his belief that the lot was not property of the marital community, but was property all of which, after his mother's death, he could devise to his sister unembarrassed by any claim which his widow might rightfully assert. This belief is further evidenced by the fact that in the will previously made by him he refers to the Ceres avenue property as "my non-community property." It is of no moment that he was mistaken in his belief that the lot was not the common property of himself and wife. His intention to devise the lot as an entirety, regardless of any right which might be asserted on behalf of the marital community, is the controlling factor. It is the testator's intention, and not the ground upon which that intention rests, that must control in the interpretation of his will. A mistaken belief on the part of a testator that he has the unrestricted power to dispose of the property absolutely is immaterial. Underhill (Law of Wills, vol. II, § 736) states the rule as follows:

> "It is not material, in determining whether a party is put to an election, that the testator, in disposing of that person's property, was in error as to its ownership, or that the testator in fact knew that he had no title to it."

See, also, Alexander's Commentaries on Wills, § 814, p. 1180. The testator's intention that the corpus of the lot, and not merely his community interest therein, should go to his sister, read into the terms of his will, was sufficient to put his widow to her election. In re Smith, 108 Cal. 119, 120, 40 Pac. 1037. See, also, In re Stewart, 74 Cal. 98, 15 Pac. 445. Having reached the conclusion that the widow, by the provisions of her husband's will, was put to her election, and that she could not and cannot choose both her own community interest in the Ceres avenue property and the devises made in her favor, the next question is: Has she made such election?

[9] That part of the decree which distributes to the widow an undivided three-fourths of the Pasadena properties has become final, no appeal having been taken therefrom. Of this undivided three-fourths, one-third thereof—i. e., an undivided one-fourth of the Pasadena lots—was received by the widow under her husband's will and solely by reason thereof. Moreover, a written stipulation was entered into prior to the entry of the decree of distribution, but after the evidence was all in and after the learned trial judge had orally announced from the bench what his decision would be, whereby it was stipulated that if it should finally be determined that the widow was put to her election, then and in that event she should be deemed to have elected to take under the will. In view of this stipulation, thus solemnly entered into, and our conclusion that by the terms of her husband's will she was put to her election, it must be held that the widow has elected to take under the will, and that therefore the Ceres avenue property and every estate therein should be distributed to the appellant, Mary J. S. Moore.

> "The widow, having accepted the devises and bequests provided for her by the will, thereby made her election and confirmed the disposition made by her husband of the common property." In re Stewart, supra.

A new trial will not be necessary, since the facts as found by the trial court in its final decree of distribution, taken in connection with the stipulation to which we have just adverted, fully support the conclusion that appellant is entitled to have distributed to her the corpus of the Ceres avenue property, including all estate therein, to the exclusion of any claim on the part of the widow.

The cause is remanded, with directions to the trial court to modify its decree of distribution to conform with the views expressed herein, and as so modified it will stand affirmed.

In re STODDART'S ESTATE.

NEWTON et al. v. STODDART et al.

(Civ. 4186.)

1. Wills 🔑104—Statute inapplicable to render sufficiently clear and distinct clause inoperative.

Where the clause qualifying testatrix's bequest to daughters was sufficiently clear and distinct that her intention could be ascertained therefrom with reasonable certainty, then Civ. Code, § 1322, providing that a clear and distinct clause cannot be affected by any other words not equally clear and distinct, will not apply so as to render the qualifying clause void for uncertainty.

2. Wills 🔑104—Clause qualifying bequest held not so uncertain as to render it void under rule of statute.

Where testatrix gave to her surviving daughters each one-sixth of the residue of her estate in equal parts, provided that if G. and E., or either of them, survived testatrix and not then be widowed, testatrix gave to M. and T. the portions that otherwise would go to G. and E. to hold in trust, testatrix's intent was that if both daughters survived and were unwidowed "the portions" would go to trustees, but if only one survived and was unwidowed then "the portion" which otherwise would go to her passed into the trust, and the qualifying clause was so uncertain as to render it void under the rule of Civ. Code, § 1322, providing that a clear and distinct devise cannot be affected by any other words not equally clear and distinct.

3. Wills 🔑104—Will not conflicting as to portion each married daughter took in event of widowhood.

Where testatrix gave to her surviving daughters each one-sixth of the residue of her estate in equal parts, but provided if either of her married daughters should be left a widow "the portion of my estate so held in trust by said trustees for either of said daughters shall at once go to and vest in and be paid to such widowed daughter," and the remaining portion be held under the terms of the trust, in view of testatrix's use of portion as intending the share each daughter was to take, the four unmarried taking absolutely and the two married ones conditionally, her intention was that when one daughter became a widow her one-sixth was to be paid to her, and not that the two-sixths should go to the daughter first widowed, and hence the language used to designate the portions was not in conflict.

4. Wills 🔑687(1)—As affecting disposition on death of one beneficiary each beneficiary held to have right to one-half trust fund.

Testatrix left two-sixths of the residue of her property in trust for two married daughters and provided that on the death of either prior to the deaths of their husbands, or the husband of either, the portion of the principal of the trust as should be held for the benefit of the deceased daughter should go at once to other unmarried daughters. Held, that each of the two married daughters had a distinct right to one-half the trust unconnected with the other's right to a like interest, and on the death of one the trust was not merged for the benefit of the surviving married daughter, but the principal of the deceased's share would go to unmarried daughters.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Eliza J. Stoddart, deceased. On proceeding for distribution by Emily Newton and another against Mary Stoddart and another, executrices. From decree granting distribution, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

Lester Wm. Roth and Frank M. Gunter, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Flint, MacKay & Bowen, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. Eliza J. Stoddart died March 1, 1914, leaving a last will and testament which was duly admitted to probate in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles. She left surviving her six daughters and one son. Four of the daughters were unmarried and were living with their mother at the time of her death. Two of her daughters, Emily Newton and Grace C. Shattuck, were married at the time of their mother's death, and Emily Newton had then a husband and one child living, and Grace C. Shattuck had a husband and five children living. The son of the deceased has no interest in this proceeding. Since the death of the testatrix, Grace C. Shattuck, one of the married daughters, died, leaving her husband and five children surviving. Lillian E. Shattuck, one of said children, is the executrix of the last will of her mother, and together with Emily Newton, the surviving married daughter of the said Eliza J. Stoddart, are the appellants in this proceeding. Mary E. Stoddart and Evelyn L. Stoddart, two of the unmarried daughters, were named as executrices of their mother's will, and as such are the respondents herein.

The testatrix, after making certain special bequests, disposed of the residue of her estate, which residue was by far the greater portion of the estate left by her, by the following provisions of her will:

"All the rest, residue and remainder of my estate I give, devise and bequeath to such of my daughters as survive me, in equal shares or parts; provided that if my said daughters, Grace Shattuck and Emily Newton, or either of them, shall survive me and not then be widowed, I give, devise and bequeath unto Mary E. Stoddart and Evelyn L. Stoddart and to their successors, the portions or portion which would otherwise go to said Grace Shattuck and Emily Newton, or either of them, under this paragraph, to have and to hold the same in trust for the following uses and purposes:

"To receive and collect the income, interest and other revenue derived therefrom and to pay the net amount thereof in equal shares to said Grace Shattuck and Emily Newton, so long as each of them shall live, unless either of them shall be left a widow, in which latter event the portion of my estate so held by said trustees for either of said daughters, shall at once go to, vest in and be paid to such widowed daughter, and the remaining portion or interest, only, shall thereafter be held under the terms of this trust by said trustees; or if only one of said daughters, to wit, Grace Shattuck and Emily Newton, survive me and is not then a widow, the whole of the net income of the portion of my estate which would have gone to her as above provided, shall be paid to such daughter, and the principal thereof shall be held by such trustees subject to the trusts in this paragraph; and on the death of said Grace Shattuck or Emily Newton or either of them prior to the death of their husbands or the husband of either of them, the portion of the principal of such trust fund as shall be held for the benefit of such deceased daughter shall at once go to and vest in my daughters, Mary E. Stoddart, Florence E. Stoddart, Evelyn L. Stoddart and Bessie D. Stoddart, or the survivors, in equal shares.

"If however my said daughters, Mary E. Stoddart, Evelyn L. Stoddart, Florence E. Stoddart and Bessie D. Stoddart, shall all predecease their sisters Grace Shattuck and Emily Newton, or either of them, then on the death of all those first above named this trust, or so much thereof as shall then be in force, shall terminate, and the fund or funds then held in > trust shall at once go to and vest in said Grace Shattuck and Emily Newton, or either of them, in such proportion or interests as they or either of them were last entitled to receive the income from such trust fund."

The court, upon final hearing, granted distribution of said residue of said estate as follows:

> "XI. That all the rest, residue and remainder of the estate of Eliza J. Stoddart, deceased, now in the hands of said executrices, as hereinbefore described, and all other property belonging to said estate and to said testatrix at the time of her death, whether described herein or not, be, and the same is hereby distributed as follows:
> "(a) An undivided one-sixth (1/6) thereof to Mary E. Stoddart, Florence E. Stoddart, Evelyn L. Stoddart and Bessie D. Stoddart, as tenants in common share and share alike.
> "(b) An undivided one-sixth (1/6) thereof to Mary E. Stoddart.
> "(c) An undivided one-sixth (1/6) thereof to Florence E. Stoddart.
> "(d) An undivided one-sixth (1/6) thereof to Evelyn L. Stoddart.
> "(e) An undivided one-sixth (1/6) thereof to Bessie D. Stoddart.
> "(f) An undivided one-sixth (1/6) thereof to Mary E. Stoddart and Evelyn L. Stoddart in trust upon the following uses and trusts:
> "To receive and collect the income, interest and other revenue derived therefrom and to pay the net amount thereof to Emily S. Newton so long as she shall live, unless she shall be left a widow; in which latter event, that is to say, upon her being left a widow, said one-sixth (1/6) interest shall at once go to, vest in, and be paid to the said Emily S. Newton, as her absolute property; and on the death of the said Emily S. Newton, prior to the death of her husband, Edward Payson Newton, the principal of said one-sixth (1/6) interest shall at once go to and vest absolutely in Mary E. Stoddart, Florence E. Stoddart, Evelyn L. Stoddart, and Bessie D. Stoddart, or such of them as may be living at the death of the said Emily S. Newton (occurring during her said husband's lifetime), as tenants in common share and share alike; and in case of the death of all four of said last named sisters, to-wit: Mary E. Stoddart, Florence E. Stoddart, Evelyn L. Stoddart and Bessie D. Stoddart, during the lifetime of the said Emily S. Newton, said trust shall cease, if the same shall then be in force, and the principal of said one-sixth (1/6) interest shall at once go to and vest in the said Emily S. Newton absolutely."

Appellants make no objection to that portion of the decree of distribution wherein an undivided one-sixth of said residue is distributed to each of the unmarried daughters, Mary E. Stoddart, Florence E. Stoddart, Evelyn L. Stoddart, and Bessie D. Stoddart, being subdivisions (b), (c), (d), and (e) of paragraph XI of the decree of distribution hereinbefore set out; but they do object to subdivisions (a) and (f) of said paragraph XI.

Subdivision (a) relates to the one-sixth interest, which, under the terms of said will, would have gone to Grace C. Shattuck, had she been widowed and living at the time of the death of her mother; and subdivision (f) relates to the one-sixth interest which would have gone to Emily S. Newton, had she been widowed and living at the time of the death of her mother.

Appellants contend that the one-sixth interest referred to in subdivision (a) should have been distributed direct to the heirs of the said Grace C. Shattuck, and that the one-sixth interest referred to in paragraph (f) should have been distributed direct to Emily S. Newton. Appellants base their claim upon the contention that all that portion of the residuary clause of the will above quoted, following the word "provided," is so vague, general, and equivocal that it cannot affect the clear and distinct desire of the testatrix expressed in that portion of the residuary clause preceding the word "provided." That portion of said residuary clause, preceding the word "provided," is as follows:

> "All the rest, residue and remainder of my estate I give, devise and bequeath to such of my daughters as survive me in equal shares or parts."

By this portion of the residuary clause, standing alone, the testatrix explicitly bequeathed the residuary portion of her estate to such of her daughters as might survive her, in equal shares or parts.

Appellants, in support of their appeal, assert that the clear and distinct devise first expressed herein by the testatrix, under the rule of construction expressed in section 1322 of the Civil Code and kindred rules, is entirely "unaffected" by the subsequent language of said residuary clause which is "not equally clear and distinct," but which is, on the contrary, ambiguous and equivocal throughout, and that the trust, attempted to be set up in the proviso following the outright gift, and which is repugnant to it, must fail in that its language is so vague, general, and equivocal that the trust is left wholly uncertain in all of its material terms. In other words, appellants' contention is that the outright bequests to the six daughters are valid, but that the attempt to limit the bequests made to the two married daughters is so uncertain as to render this limitation absolutely void, leaving the straight bequests of the whole of the residuary property to the six daughters of the deceased unaffected by any other portion of the will.

Section 1322 of the Civil Code is as follows:

> "In What Case Devise Not Affected.—A clear and distinct devise or bequest cannot be affected by any reasons assigned therefor, or by any other words not equally clear and distinct, or by inference or argument from other parts of the will, or by an inaccurate recital of or reference to its contents in another part of the will."

This rule of construction put in succinct form by our Code is one that has long prevailed, not only in this state, but generally in other jurisdictions in this country. Church on Probate Law and Practice (2d Ed.) vol. 3, p. 2179.

In Thompson on Wills the rule is thus stated:

> "If the subsequent clause is vague and unintelligible and the prior clause is clear and intelligible, the prior clause will not be destroyed, cut down, or limited by the subsequent clause." Section 154, p. 134.

Taking the Code section and stripping it of all useless verbiage, the rule for our purpose may be stated as follows: A clear and distinct devise cannot be affected by any other words not equally clear and distinct. This section of the Civil Code was before the Supreme Court in the two cases of the Estate of Tooley, 170 Cal. 164, 149 Pac. 574, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 516, and the Estate of Briggs, 186 Cal. 351, 199 Pac. 322. In the latter case the court said:

> "Nor is the expression of the testatrix's intention contained in the second clause open to the objection that it is not 'clear and distinct.' In Estate of Tooley [supra], a similar question was presented. The will in that case read:
> "'I give all my property at my death to my daughter, Logan Mattie Tooley.
> "'If at her death she has neither husband or children I desire any property that may be left divided equally among my sisters and brother.'
> "Of the contention that the words of the second paragraph were not as clear and distinct as those of the first, and consequently could not cut down the distinct devise contained in the first, the court said: 'In view of these authorities it cannot be said that the words of the second paragraph of the will are not equally clear and distinct as those of the first paragraph. We think no case can be found in which a will indicating a disposition of property by the word "desire" or "wish" has been held not to be sufficient to constitute a will. The meaning of the word, when used in such connection in a will, is as clear as that of any other word in the language.'
> "In the case here, although the testatrix used the technical word 'bequeath' in the first clause, the word 'desire' used in the second, in connection with the words she has used in the first, equally well expresses her testamentary intention and is equally as clear as the word 'bequeath.'"

Commenting upon certain words of a will and their sufficiency under this section of the Civil Code, the Supreme Court uses the following language:

> "The words of the qualifying clause first above quoted are not grammatical in form, but they are entirely clear and distinct as an expression of the will of the testatrix that if any legatee or devisee shall undertake to contest the will the legacy given to such person shall be thereby forfeited. The rule referred to does not apply to the case." Estate of Shirley, 180 Cal. 400, 181 Pac. 777.

[1] From the foregoing authorities it would appear that if the qualifying clause is sufficiently clear and distinct that the intention of the testatrix can be ascertained therefrom with reasonable certainty, then the rule laid down in section 1322 of the Civil Code will not apply so as to render the qualifying clause void for uncertainty.

[2] With this understanding as to the meaning of section 1322 we will now proceed to examine a few of the provisions of the qualifying clause of the will objected to by appellants, and which they contend are so uncertain as to render them void under the rule prescribed by said section.

The first objection is made to the following portion of the will:

> "Provided that if my said daughters, Grace Shattuck and Emily Newton, or either of them, shall survive me and not then be widowed, I give, and bequeath unto Mary E. Stoddart and Evelyn L. Stoddart and to their successors, the portions or portion which would otherwise go to said Grace Shattuck and Emily Newton, or either of them, under this paragraph, to have and to hold the same in trust for the following uses and purposes."

It is the contention of appellants that, since, by the above provision of the will, "it is stated that it is 'the portions or portion' which would otherwise go to Grace Shattuck and Emily Newton 'or either of them' that is to pass into the trust, and it is not stated under what contingency the single portion only passes, and, if a single portion, which portion; it will be demonstrated that the testatrix has failed to indicate with the clarity required by section 1322 of the Civil Code and the authorities previously cited, or at all, the part of the clearly expressed gift referred to."

"The clearly expressed gift," we understand counsel to mean, is the two-sixths of the estate given unconditionally to the two married daughters in that portion of the will immediately preceding the word "provided." It is admitted that the terms of the will preceding the word "provided," or as we will hereafter refer to this part of the will as the "proviso," make clear the contingency upon which the whole of the gift passes into the trust fund. This contingency is the survival under coverture of both married daughters. If both of the married daughters of the testatrix survive her under coverture, then the two-sixths interest or "the two portions" which would otherwise go to them goes into and forms the trust fund. This is conceded by appellants, but it is contended by them that the proviso fails to state clearly the contingency upon which only a single portion may pass into the trust fund, and, if a single portion, which portion.

The proviso plainly states that "if my said daughters * * * or either of them, shall survive me and not be widowed, I give to" the trustees "the portions or portion which would otherwise go to" said married daughters "or either of them." The only reasonable construction that can be given to these words is that if both of the married daughters survive the testatrix and are then unwidowed, "the portions" will go to the trustees, but if only one of said married daughters survive the testatrix and she is unwidowed, then "the portion" which would otherwise go to her (if she was then not under coverture) passes into the trust fund. We can see no escape from such a construction. The intent of the testatrix is in our opinion clear and explicit, and is as above set out. We are, therefore, unable to agree with appellants that this portion of the will of the testatrix should be declared void for uncertainty.

[3] Appellants next contend that there is a hopeless conflict in the language used to designate the portions that each married daughter is to take in the event of her widowhood. It is set forth in the will that in the event either of the married daughters shall be left a widow "[the portion of my estate so held by said trustees for either of said daughters shall at once go to and vest in and be paid to such widowed daughter] and the remaining portion or interest only shall thereafter be held under the terms of this trust by said trustees." Appellants insist that the portion of the above provision of the will, set off in brackets, compels the vesting in favor of the first widowed daughter of both portions of the trust estate; that the words "held * * * for either" constitute a designation of the entire property held in trust and that such a construction is in conflict with the clause of the will following that in brackets, which latter clause shows that the passing of the entire trust property could not have been intended. From this provision of the will, it is clear that the testatrix did not intend that by the death of the husband of one of her married daughters his widow should receive all of the trust property. The will provides that if the portion is paid to her, the "remaining portion shall be held on the terms of this trust." Throughout the whole will, the testatrix refers repeatedly to "the portion" of the estate. By such reference she clearly means the one-sixth interest which each of her daughters was to receive in the property of her estate —the four unmarried daughters to receive their portions absolutely, and the two married daughters conditionally. In the same sense she uses the terms "the portion" in the clause of the will last above quoted, and when she provided that "the portion of my estate so held by said trustees for either of said daughters shall at once go to such widowed daughter," she could have intended but one thing, and that was that the one-sixth interest held by said trustees for said widowed daughter should at once go to her upon the death of her husband. That she could not have intended that both portions, or the two-sixths interest, should go to the daughter first widowed, is made still more apparent when we read the balance of this clause which provides that "the remaining portion or interest only shall thereafter be held under the terms of this trust by said trustees." We think, therefore, that it clearly appears from this clause of the will that the testatrix intended that in the event of the death of the husband of either of her married daughters, then the portion, or one-sixth interest, held by her trustees for said married daughter, should immediately be paid to said widowed daughter, and the remaining portion or one-sixth interest, only, should be held by said trustees for the other married daughter. There is, in our opinion, no conflict in the language of this clause used to designate the portion that each married daughter is to take in the event of her widowhood.

[4] The third objection made by appellants is that the daughter Grace Shattuck having died approximately four years after the decease of the testatrix, it cannot now be ascertained what part of the trust property is to go to the single daughters. This involves the construction of the following clause of the will:

> "On the death of the said Grace Shattuck or Emily Newton, or either of them, prior to the death of the husbands, or the husband of either of them, the portion of the principal of said trust fund as shall be held for the benefit of said deceased daughter shall at once go to and vest in the four unmarried daughters."

It is the appellants' contention that the language used is entirely uncertain, in that it refers to the portion of the principal of such trust fund as shall be held for the benefit of said deceased daughter, when there is no portion of the principal of the trust fund held for one daughter separately from the other, but that there is a single trust fund held for both jointly. Appellants base their argument upon a prior clause in the trust provision reading as follows: "To pay the net amount thereof in equal shares to said Grace Shattuck and Emily Newton so long as each of them shall live," and appellants claim that by providing that the net income from the two-sixths interest is to be paid in equal shares to the two married daughters, that the will thereby merged these two interests in the one single trust fund, and that the trustees hold both interests as one trust for the joint benefit of the two beneficiaries and hold no portion thereof for either beneficiary separately. Appellants rely upon the Estate of Fair, 136 Cal. 79, 68 Pac. 306, to support them in this contention. In that case the court decided that where trustees were directed to collect the income from certain real and personal property and to pay the net proceeds thereof to certain beneficiaries, that the real and personal property constituted a single trust, and where the trust is declared invalid as to the real property, the trust as to the personal property, being inseparably united and interwoven with the invalid trust in regard to the real property, is itself invalid and must fail with the defeat of the trust scheme of the testator. The court said:

> "Under these conditions, to hold that the testator, if he had known that his attempted disposition of the realty was invalid, and that upon his death his vast amount of real property, worth many millions of dollars, would go immediately in fee-simple to his children, would have given them also the income of the personal property, would be to indulge in a most impossible supposition and to violate the settled law on the subject."

We fail to see any similarity in the principles of law involved in the proceeding before us with those in the Estate of Fair, supra. Neither do we agree with appellants' contention that there is no portion of the trust fund held for one daughter separately from the other. On the other hand, we think that it is clear from the will that each of these two married daughters has a distinct and separate right to one-half of the trust fund unconnected in any manner with the right of her married sister to a like interest in said fund, except that their two interests were to be held by the same trustees. The interests were exactly alike, and, therefore, the direction to the trustees to pay the net income therefrom to the two sisters in equal shares was simply a convenient mode of expressing the wish of the testatrix as to the disposition of this income and could not, and in our opinion did not, change the nature of the interest held by them respectively.

Appellants in their brief have directed the court's attention to other portions of the will which they consider lacking in that clarity demanded by section 1322 of the Civil Code, and which, therefore, are void for uncertainty. We consider, however, that the most serious objections made by appellants are those which we have hereinbefore discussed and which we believe we have sufficiently shown are not subject to the criticism made against them by appellants. Those objections which we have not discussed are in our opinion not well taken.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that the limitations imposed by the testatrix upon the bequests made to her two married daughters are not so uncertain as to render them absolutely void, but on the other hand, we are of the opinion that the qualifying clause prescribing these limitations is sufficiently clear and distinct, that the intention of the testatrix can be ascertained therefrom with reasonable certainty, and is, therefore, legal and valid. Furthermore, we are of the opinion that the lower court correctly interpreted the terms of the will as indicated by the decree of distribution, the material portions of which are hereinbefore set out.

The decree of distribution is therefore affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; HOUSER, J.

62 Cal. App. 198

SOFUYE v. PIETERS-WHEELER SEED CO. (Civ. 2605.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 14, 1923.)

1. Judgment 🔑143(3)—Facts held sufficient to warrant vacation of default judgment.

Lessee under contract to raise crops for defendant gave lessor a crop mortgage. Under an agreement of all parties that any sums becoming due to lessee should be paid as additional security to lessor, defendant paid over all that was due lessee under his contract; lessor agreeing to defend against lessee. Defendant forwarded suit papers, but judgment went by default. On motion to set aside the default, alleging mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, held, that an order opening the default was properly granted.

2. Appeal and error 🔑957(1)—Action of trial judge in opening default not disturbed, in absence of discretion.

A nisi prius order opening up a default judgment will not be disturbed, in the absence of an abuse of discretion, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

3. Judgment 🔑136—Statutory rule for vacating liberally construed.

In the absence of any showing of prejudice to plaintiff, the remedial power to open up default judgments, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, should be liberally exercised to dispose of all cases on their substantial merits without unreasonable delay.

4. Judgment 🔑153(1)—Motion to vacate filed 19 days after entry of default held not unreasonable delay.

Where defendant reasonably and in good faith relied upon an agreement to protect and defend any suit plaintiff might bring, a motion to vacate a default judgment, filed 19 days after entry, was made within a reasonable time, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 473; plaintiff not having shown prejudice.

5. Judgment 🔑143(10)—One agreeing to defend an action against another held not the latter's attorney as affecting the question of opening default judgment.

A seed company employed plaintiff's assignor to plant and harvest a crop of seed on leased land; it being agreed that the assignor might execute a chattel mortgage to the lessor to secure the rent, but that the crop might be delivered to the seed company on its paying to the lessor any sums due the lessee. The seed company made such payment to the lessor, and the latter agreed that he would defend any suit brought by plaintiff. On suit being commenced against the seed company it sent the suit papers to the lessor, but the latter suffered default judgment to be entered. Held, that the lessor, while in a sense an agent of the seed company, could not be regarded as its attorney, within the rule that a client is bound by the negligence of his attorney in permitting entry of default.

6. Judgment 🔑148—Defendant against whom default was entered held clothed with sufficient interest to urge motion to vacate.

That defendant, a seed company, paid to a lessor of land all that was due to the lessee for the services of the latter in raising a crop of seed on the land, such payment being made under agreement of all parties concerned to secure the payment of the rent due, did not deprive defendant of interest, so as to preclude it from moving to open a default judgment against it in favor of an assignee of the lessee, though the payment was made under an agreement of the lessor to defend any suit for the services rendered.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Action by I. Sofuye against the Pieters-Wheeler Seed Company. From an order setting aside a default judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Smallpage & Rex, of Stockton, for appellant.

Mastick & Partridge and Brooks Cox, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff prosecutes this appeal from an order setting aside a default judgment entered against the defendant on the 17th day of March, 1922. The plaintiff is the assignee of one S. Kagi of the latter's interest in a certain contract entered into between said Kagi and the defendant on January 3, 1921. By the terms of said contract Kagi was to plant certain land then occupied by him in what is known as "the New Hope Pocket," San Joaquin county, in carrots, beets, parsnips, and parsley, with seed to be furnished by the defendant. Kagi was to "tend, cultivate, and harvest the seed of such crops and to deliver such seed to defendant f. o. b. Hood, Cal." The defendant, in addition to furnishing such seed, was also to furnish the necessary sheets and bags for harvesting the crops and to pay said Kagi for the use of said land and for his services for the work required for the purpose, as follows, 12 cents per pound for carrot seed, 8 cents per pound for beet seed, 8 cents per pound for parsnip seed, and 10 cents per pound for parsley seed, all to be marketable and produced and delivered, deducting, however, from the total amount of seed raised and delivered an amount of seed of the various kinds equal to the amount of seed of such kinds furnished by defendant to said Kagi to plant. It was further provided in said contract that, in case said Kagi failed or neglected properly to care for, cultivate, and harvest said crops of seed, defendant might do so, and might, in such event, charge the reasonable and necessary cost of doing said work to said Kagi. Under this contract defendant furnished said Kagi the necessary seed of the various kinds mentioned and Kagi planted the same in said land.

It is alleged in the complaint that Kagi failed to fully harvest and deliver the same to the defendant and that pursuant to the provisions of said contract that the defendant, upon such failure, might itself complete the harvesting of said crops, the said defendant did harvest the same, took possession thereof, and, so states the complaint, "necessarily expended in so doing certain moneys, but that plaintiff has no knowledge or information sufficient to enable him to state what moneys were so expended by defendant." It is alleged upon information and belief, that 31,580 pounds of carrot seed, 9,094 pounds of beet seed, 4,500 pounds of parsley seed and 24,450 pounds of parsnip seed were harvested from said land and received by the defendant, and that the aggregate value thereof, figuring according to the agreed prices therefor, was the sum of $6,923.12, minus the necessary cost and expenses in completing the harvesting and delivery of said crops and also the amount due the defendant for the quantities of the several kinds of seed which defendant furnished said Kagi for planting, as to which amounts, the complaint states, the plaintiff has no such information or knowledge as to enable him to state the precise or approximate total thereof. The complaint further states that there is to be deducted the sum of $500 which was advanced under said contract by defendant to said Kagi. The prayer of the complaint is for an accounting by the defendant to him for the said crops of seed and that, upon the ascertainment by such accounting of the amount due the plaintiff, he be awarded judgment against the defendant for said amount.

The complaint was filed January 20, 1922. Summons was issued on the same day and the same was forwarded to the sheriff of the county of Santa Clara, who, on the 23d day of January, 1922, served the same, together with a copy of the complaint, upon L. W. Wheeler, the president of the defendant, at the city of Gilroy, in the county of Santa Clara. The defendant having failed to appear and demur to or answer the complaint within the time prescribed by law, a demand was made by the plaintiff on the 3d day of March, 1922, for the entry of a default against said defendant, and the clerk of the court, in accordance with said demand, entered said default. Thereafter, and on the 13th day of March, 1922, the court received evidence in support of the complaint, and on the 17th of March filed its findings of fact, conclusions of law, and default judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $2,215.94.

On the 6th day of April, 1922, the defendant filed a notice of motion to set aside the default judgment on the grounds that the defendant failed to answer the complaint within the time prescribed by law by reason of its "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect." Section 473, Code Civ. Proc. Said notice fixed Monday, the 10th day of April, 1922, at 10 o'clock a. m., for the hearing of the motion. With this notice of motion the defendant filed an affidavit of merits made by L. W. Wheeler, the president of the defendant corporation, and also relied, in furtherance of the motion, on an affidavit filed on March 25, 1922, and made by W. H. George, the general manager and the attorney in fact for S. H. Cowell, Isabella M. Cowell, and Helen E. Cowell, the owners of the land upon which the seeds referred to were grown and who had leased said land to said Kagi; said affidavit having been so filed in support of a motion previously noticed to stay execution of the default judgmen. Accompanying these papers was also a proposed answer to the complaint. It is admitted by the appellant in his brief that respondent's proposed answer states a good defense to the complaint, and therefore it will not be necessary to reproduce herein the contents of the proposed answer.

The affidavit of L. W. Wheeler, after stating that deponent is president of the defendant corporation and briefly reciting the terms of the contract between said defendant and the said Kagi, is, in substance, as follows: That at the time that said contract was entered into an agreement was had between the defendant, Kagi, and the Cowells, above named, that Kagi was to execute and give to the said Cowells a chattel mortgage on the crops to be grown on said land as security for the payment of any rent which might fall due and become payable to the latter, who, as seen, were the owners of the land; that it was further agreed that there should be excepted from said chattel mortgage any seeds which might be furnished and delivered to the defendant under its contract with Kagi upon the distinct understanding and agreement that any sums to become due to said Kagi under said agreement should be paid to the Cowells as further security for the payment of any rent due for the use of the land; that under the contract between Kagi and the defendant the sum of $1,157.79, and no more, became due to the former; that demand was made upon defendant by the plaintiff herein for any moneys due under said contract and that when said demand was made the defendant agreed with the said Cowells and the latter agreed with the defendant that they would defend and protect the said defendant against any claim the plaintiff might make herein against the defendant for any sums due to said Kagi under the said contract, and that under said understanding and agreement the said defendant paid to the Cowells the said sum of $1,157.79, due and payable to said Kagi under his contract with the defendant; that the summons and copy of the complaint in this action were served upon the affiant as the president of the defendant, as above stated, on the 31st day of January, 1922, and that, acting upon the understanding and agreement with the Cowells that the latter would protect and defend the defendant in any suit or action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover the said sum of $1,157.79, he forwarded said summons and complaint to W. H. George, the general manager and attorney in fact of the Cowells; that affiant believed that said Cowells would proceed to answer the said complaint and defend the said action; that the defendant, under the terms of the contract with Kagi, was justly indebted to the latter in the sum of $1,157.79 and no more, "excepting that it was clearly understood and agreed that the same should be paid to the said S. H. Cowell, Isabella M. Cowell, and Helen E. Cowell as security for any moneys due from S. Kagi to the said" Cowells; "that affiant is informed and believes and therefore alleges that judgment has been entered against said defendant for more than double the amount which would be justly due to the said S. Kagi under any circumstances."

The affidavit of W. H. George, above referred to, declares that the land upon which the seeds were grown was leased to S. Kagi by the Cowells above named; that Kagi made, executed, and delivered to the Cowells a chattel mortgage on all growing crops to be raised on said land for the season, December 1, 1920, to December 1, 1921, except those raised under contract with the said defendant; that the Cowells had an understanding and agreement with Kagi and the defendant that the chattel mortgage should not cover the seeds raised under the contract between Kagi and the defendant, "for the reason that the said Pieters-Wheeler Seed Company was unwilling to make the necessary advances for planting, cultivating, and harvesting the said seed crop if the same were covered by a chattel mortgage," and that there was a further understanding and agreement between Kagi, the defendant, and the Cowells that there should be and there was assigned to the Cowells all the proceeds and profits of the said seed crops over and above the advances made by the defendant, to be applied by the Cowells "upon the payment of the said sums due from the said Kagi to the said S. H. Cowell, Isabella M. Cowell, and Helen E. Cowell"; that at or about the time of harvest in the year 1921 Kagi absconded and disappeared and abandoned the said land and the seed crops thereon and did not pay the rent of said land or the other sums due the Cowells, and that said Cowells commenced a suit in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco to foreclose the said chattel mortgage; that the value of the property covered by said mortgage is wholly insufficient to pay the sums due the said Cowells, and that said Kagi is utterly insolvent and has no property of any kind or character whatsoever; that, in accordance with the understanding and agreement with the said Cowells, the said Kagi, and the said defendant, the last-named accounted to the said Cowells and paid to them the sum of $1,157.79, which was all that was due the said Kagi under the agreement with the defendant for the raising of said seed; that on or about the 20th day of January, 1922, the present action was commenced and copy of the complaint served upon the defendant in the city of Gilroy, county of Santa Clara, on the 31st day of January, 1922; that affiant, as manager of the Cowells, agreed with the defendant to defend and protect it against the claim of the plaintiff, I. Sofuye, and in accordance with said agreement the defendant forwarded the summons and copy of the complaint to the affiant in the city of San Francisco, "but the affiant believed that the whole matter was covered in the suit to foreclose the said chattel mortgage and neglected to take the matter up with his attorney, whereupon the said plaintiff has entered the default of said defendant and obtained judgment thereon, as affiant is informed and believes, for a sum more than double the amount which could have been, by any possibility, due to the said S. Kagi"; that affiant has fully and fairly stated the facts of the case to his attorney and is informed by the said attorney and therefore states that the Cowells have a claim to the moneys due from the said defendant prior to and superior to the claim of the said I. Sofuye.

No counter affidavit was filed or any showing otherwise made in rebuttal of the salient facts set forth in the foregoing affidavits. One of the attorneys for the appellant did make and file an affidavit, which, however, contains nothing which affects or bears upon the question to be determined upon this appeal.

[1, 2] It cannot justly be declared, upon the record as it is presented here, that the action of the court below in granting the relief asked for by the defendant involved error. An application for relief, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, from the consequences of a default judgment, is addressed to the sound judicial discretion of the court to which such application is made; and, unless it can be said from the face of the record on appeal that, in granting or disallowing such a motion, the nisi prius court has abused the discretion committed to it in disposing of such a proceeding, the order will not be disturbed on appeal.

[3] It has for many years uniformly been held in this state that the power vested in trial courts by section 473 should be freely and liberally exercised by said courts to the end that they might "mould and direct its proceedings, so as to dispose of cases upon their substantial merits, and without unreasonable delay, regarding mere technicalities as obstacles to be avoided, rather than as principles to which effect is to be given in derogation of substantial right." Roland v. Kreyenhagen, 18 Cal. 455; Brasher v. White, 53 Cal. App. 545, 200 Pac. 657, 661.

In Nicoll v. Weldon, 130 Cal. 667, 63 Pac. 64, it is said:

> "Section 473 * * * is a remedial provision and is to be liberally construed so as to dispose of cases upon their substantial merits, and to give to the party claiming in good faith to have a substantial defense to the action an opportunity to present it. Buell v. Emerich, 85 Cal. 116; Harbaugh v. Honey Lake, etc., Water Co., 109 Cal. 70; Melde v. Reynolds, 129 Cal. 308. It is for this reason that we more readily listen to an appeal from an order refusing to set aside a default, than where the motion has been granted, since in such case the defendant may be deprived of a substantial right, whereas it may be assumed, if nothing to the contrary is shown, that the plaintiff will be able at any time to establish his cause of action. If, for any reason, he will be unable to do so, that fact should be made to appear; but if he is merely subjected to delay or inconvenience by having the default set aside, he can be compensated therefor by the terms which the court will impose as the condition of granting the motion."

In Berri v. Rogero, 168 Cal. 736, 145 Pac 95, the rule enunciated by section 473 where that section has been successfully invoked in a proceeding involving the application to be relieved from a default judgment is admirably expounded by Chief Justice Sullivan, as follows:

> "The law does not favor snap judgments The policy of the law is to have every litigated case tried upon its merits, and it looks with disfavor upon a party who, regardless of the merits of his case, attempts to take advantage of the mistake, surprise, inadvertence, or neglect of his adversary. Where a party in default makes seasonable application to be relieved therefrom, and files an affidavit of merits alleging a good defense, and the plaintiff files no counter affidavit and makes no showing that he has suffered any prejudice or that injustice will result from the trial of the case upon its merits, very slight evidence will be required to justify a court in setting aside the default. A broad discretion is allowed to courts in granting relief against default, and it is in cases only where the lower court has abused its discretion that the appellate court will reverse its action. Counsel for appellant and respondents in their briefs agree, and this court agrees with them, that the following is a correct statement of the rule applicable to courts in dealing with defaults: 'It is largely a matter of discretion, to be liberally exercised by the court in the furtherance of justice, and where the action of the trial court will result in a trial upon the merits, the appellate courts are very reluctant to interfere with the exercise of such discretion, and will do so only where it clearly appears that there has been a plain abuse of discretion.' "

It is said in Vinson v. Los Angeles Pac. R. Co., 147 Cal. 479, 483, that, where the trial court has granted or refused to grant an application for the setting aside of a default judgment, an appellate court will not interfere with the exercise of the discretion of the court below—

> "except in a case where a clear abuse of discretion is apparent. Particularly is this so where the discretion is exercised in favor of the granting of the relief sought, as such action tends to bring about a conclusion on the merits, which is always to be desired. O'Brien v. Leach, 139 Cal. 220 [96 Am. St. Rep. 105, and note, 72 Pac. 1004]. It has been said by this court that where the circumstances are such as to lead the court to hesitate in such a matter, it is better, as a general rule, that the doubt should be resolved in favor of the application. Watson v. San Francisco & Humboldt Bay R. R. Co., 41 Cal. 17."

[4] 1. It cannot be doubted that, under the circumstances, the defendant in this case proceeded within a reasonable time after the default was entered to take the necessary legal steps for securing an order setting aside the default judgment. The affidavit of W. H. George was filed eight days after the entry of judgment, and while this affidavit was not, when filed, intended as in furtherance of a motion to set aside the default, no such motion then having been filed, its purpose was, nevertheless, to secure a nullification of the default judgment and, as seen, was used in support of the motion subsequently made. The motion was filed 19 days after the default judgment was entered. One of the attorneys for the plaintiff addressed a letter at Stockton under date of March 18, 1922, to the defendant's manager at Gilroy in Santa Clara county, in which he notified the defendant of the entry of the judgment "on the 16th day of March, 1922, in the sum of $2,215.94," and it may safely be assumed that this letter was not received by the defendant's manager at Gilroy until the 20th or 21st of March.

2. The neglect of the defendant to answer the complaint within the time required by law was, as we have seen, due to the fact that the defendant had paid to the Cowells the sum of $1,157.79 which was coming to Kagi from the defendant upon an agreement between the defendant and the Cowells that the latter would protect and defend the defendant against any action which the plaintiff, as assignee of Kagi, might bring against the defendant to recover the amount so paid to the Cowells. While it was, as a matter of law, the duty of the defendant to have answered the complaint, still its reliance entirely upon the Cowells to keep their agreement to defend the action and thus protect the defendant appears to have been characterized by good faith and an honest belief that the Cowells would, upon receiving the summons and copy of the complaint, seasonably interpose an answer or demur to the plaintiff's pleading. In relying upon the promise of the Cowells or their manager to take the necessary steps to defend against the claim of plaintiff, the defendant acted as any reasonably careful person would ordinarily act, and therefore its neglect to answer within due legal time is, in our judgment, clearly excusable, within the meaning and intent of section 473. Viewing these considerations, together with the fact that defendant acted within a reasonable time after having been notified of the entry of the default judgment and the showing of a meritorious defense to the action, we have here a case to which the following observations in the case of Vinson v. Los Angeles Pac. R. Co., 147 Cal. 479, 82 Pac. 53, have peculiar and singularly pertinent application:

> "The inadvertence or neglect here was one that well might occur to a reasonably careful man, there is no pretense of bad faith, and the application for relief was made so promptly after the expiration of the ten days that no appreciable injury could have been caused to plaintiffs by the delay."

[5] It is contended, however, that in order to make a case for the relief sought herein it was necessary to show a legal excuse for the neglect of George, as the agent of the Cowells, in not answering the complaint within the time required, and that no such showing was made. The argument in support of this contention is that under the agreement between the Cowells and the defendant the relation of principal and agent was created and that the neglect of the latter is imputable to the defendant itself. Cases in which it is held that the negligence of the defaulting party's attorney to answer within the time prescribed constituted the negligence of the client are cited to sustain the argument thus advanced. We think, however, there is a difference between the two situations. While it is true that there was an element of principal and agent created by the agreement between the defendant and the Cowells, yet it cannot be said that it was such a relation as exists between attorney and client. An attorney holds himself out as one who will faithfully perform any service within the scope of his profession committed to him by a litigant or a client, and when employed in his professional capacity is always specifically charged with the duty of taking such steps as the case requires shall be taken to protect or conserve the rights of the client. Here the defendant acted upon an agreement with parties who, so far as we know from the record, are not attorneys at law or professionally engaged in attending to the legal business of others. In other words, under the agreement between the defendant and the Cowells the latter were not employed to act as the former's attorneys or in a professional capacity. Hence the question for the court to determine was whether the defendant, in placing dependence upon the good faith of the Cowells as to the agreement between them and the former, acted in good faith and as a reasonably prudent business man would ordinarily act under such circumstances.

[6] It is further contended that, since the defendant paid to the Cowells the sum due from it to Kagi, and the Cowells thereupon agreed to defend any action which the plaintiff might institute to recover said money from the defendant, the latter has no financial interest in the action or its outcome; that therefore it has no such interest in the action as to justify it in interfering in any manner with the default judgment which was entered against it. There is no support either in law or in fact for this contention. The affidavits show that the judgment was against the defendant for a sum far in excess of any amount which Kagi or his assignee would, in any event, be entitled to recover. Moreover, if it should transpire that the defendant had illegally paid to the Cowells the sum which it admitted was due Kagi, it would be liable to the assignee of Kagi for the amount so paid, albeit in such case it would have a right of action against the Cowells for the return of said money. In this connection it may be suggested that the court, as it should have done, in passing upon the moton, in all probability took into consideration the fact, as alleged in the affidavits filed by the defendant, that the amount of the default judgment was so far beyond that which the plaintiff would in any case be entitled to recover that it would be unjust and perhaps result in injustice if the defendant were not permitted to litigate the claim involved in the judgment.

We have carefully examined the cases cited by the appellant and find that there is nothing in any of them which militates against the conclusion at which we have arrived. Each case must be determined upon its own peculiar circumstances and by the light of the rules as to such proceedings as this which are expounded and applied in the cases to which we have above referred.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

BARRAGER v. WALLS. (Civ. 4177.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 8, 1923.)

1. Good will 🔑7—Evidence held to establish breach of contract in depriving purchaser of former patronage.

In an action to recover a balance due plaintiff on the sale of certain business formerly owned by her, evidence held sufficient to establish that through her husband she had drawn off and deprived defendant of certain patronage to which he was entitled under the contract of sale.

2. Good will 🔑7—Evidence held to sustain finding seller of business had thereafter engaged in similar business in violation of his contract.

Testimony of four witnesses tending to prove that immediately after the sale of his business a vendor entered into a similar business in violation of a provision in the contract of sale, though disputed, held sufficient to sustain a finding to that effect.

3. Good will 🔑7—Failure of proof in one particular held not to preclude recovery of damages for breach of sales agreement.

In an action to recover a balance due plaintiff on the sale of a certain business, wherein defendant counterclaimed for damages, alleging that plaintiff and her husband had conspired to deprive him of the patronage to which he was entitled, and in violation of their contract had engaged in a similar business using formulas which they had agreed not to use, where the proof tended to establish the allegations of such counterclaim except the use of the formulas, held, that defendant's failure to prove the use of such formulas would not defeat his right to recover damages.

4. Sales 🔑359(1)—Evidence held insufficient to establish the amount of damages for the breach of a contract of sale by the seller.

In an action to recover a balance due on the sale of a certain business, wherein defendant counterclaimed for damages for the breach by plaintiffs of their contract of sale, evidence held insufficient to establish the amount of such damages as equivalent to the unpaid balance of the purchase price sued for.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Lena Barrager against James L. Walls. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and remanded for new trial on a particular issue.

Burrel D. Neighbors and F. A. Jeffers, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Wm. T. Kendrick, Jr., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This action was instituted for the purpose of recovering the sum of $2,750 alleged to be due plaintiff on the sale of a certain business carried on in the city of Los Angeles, formerly owned by plaintiff, and by her sold to defendant on April 4, 1921. Defendant, after denying certain allegations of the complaint, set up as an affirmative defense that he purchased the business and the property pertaining thereto from the plaintiff and her husband, paying therefor the sum of $4,115 in cash, and giving his check for $2,750 additional. He admitted said check had not been paid. He further alleged that plaintiff and her husband executed to him a bill of sale of said business and property, wherein they transferred said business and property, together with the good will of said business, to defendant, and further promised not to carry on or engage in a similar business within the city of Los Angeles for a period of one year, and that they would not use in the state of California the formulas used by defendant, or which had been theretofore used by plaintiff in said business; that immediately after said sale the plaintiff and her husband conspired to destroy defendant's business and to draw off customers from defendant by importuning them not to patronize defendant, but to do business with others, and represented to numerous regular customers of the defendant that defendant was soon to cease doing business, and would soon be out of said business, and recommended said customers to purchase goods from persons other than said defendant; that, pursuant to said conspiracy, and as a result of the acts of said plaintiff and her husband, a large number of regular and other customers of the defendant in said business had been induced to withdraw their business from defendant, and defendant had thereby been deprived to a large extent of the good will so purchased by him to his damage in the sum of $2,750, and that plaintiff and her husband are using, through others, the formulas mentioned in said bill of sale, and contrary to the provisions thereof, and that plaintiff and her husband have co-operated with others to take away the business from the defendant.

[1] The court found in favor of defendant upon all the issues raised by his separate defense, and gave judgment in his favor, it having been stipulated that all the acts of F. J. Barrager, the husband of plaintiff, might be considered to be the acts of the plaintiff. Plaintiff appeals from said judgment, and the sole ground of her appeal is that there is no evidence to support the findings of the court.

Appellant first claims that there is no evidence to show that either she or her husband ever drew off or deprived respondent of the trade of a single customer of the business sold. The witness Houk testified that he was present when appellant's husband, with a Mr. Lieb, were endeavoring to persuade a Mr. Fontes, a customer of respondent, to transfer his business from the defendant to a new firm composed of Barrager and Lieb. The witness Conboy testified that all of the customers of the defendant were taken away. He further testified that Barrager and Lieb simply froze the respondent out; that they took his money and then froze him out, and that they started in business again. This testimony would tend to establish the fact that the husband of appellant, F. J. Barrager, drew off and deprived respondent of the trade of the customers of the business sold, and, when taken in connection with the stipulation above mentioned, was sufficient to support the finding of the court upon this issue.

[2] Appellant next specifies that the record does not show that appellant or her husband entered into any business of a similar nature within the county of Los Angeles within one year from the date of the sale to respondent. The business sold to respondent was known as the Cabin Beverage Company, and consisted of the manufacture and sale of cider. The witnesses Swisher, Houk, Vail, and Conboy, all gave testimony tending to prove that immediately after the sale by appellant to respondent L. J. Barrager and Lieb entered into the business of manufacturing and selling cider within the city of Los Angeles. This testimony, it is true, is disputed by L. J. Barrager and other witnesses of appellant; but the trial court evidently was impressed with the testimony of respondent's witnesses, and found, upon their testimony, in favor of respondent. The testimony above referred to amply supports this finding.

[3] The third exception taken by appellant to the findings of the court is that the record nowhere shows that appellant or her husband ever used or attempted to use the formulas used by the Cabin Beverage Company and sold by appellant to respondent. There is very little testimony upon this issue, and it may be doubted whether there is sufficient testimony to support this finding; but, conceding this to be true, it does not necessarily follow that for this reason the judgment should be reversed. The court having found on sufficient evidence that F. J. Barrager, appellant's husband, had established and carried on a similar business to that sold by appellant to respondent, contrary to the express provisions of the bill of sale transferring the said business, it would not be a matter of any great consequence, legally speaking, whether or not he used in this business the formulas which he had formerly used in the business of the Cabin Beverage Company. If it had been satisfactorily proven that he had used these formulas, this fact would have been an additional reason why respondent should have prevailed in this action; but the failure of respondent to establish this fact after having established other facts which in themselves were sufficient to entitle him to recover would not in any way impair or invalidate the judgment in his favor.

[4] The further objection is made that there is no evidence to support the finding that respondent was damaged in the sum of $2,750. It is not claimed that there is any direct testimony as to the amount of damages sustained by respondent.

But it is contended on behalf of the respondent that he paid for said business and good will a consideration of $2,750, and that there is evidence to the effect that all of the customers of the respondent were taken away from him, and that "they simply got him out of business—took his money and then froze him out." In other words, respondent claims that the testimony shows that the entire business purchased by him from appellant was ruined by the acts of herself and husband, and that, as he paid the sum of $2,750 for said business and good will, he was damaged in at least the amount of said sum. We agree with respondent to the extent that the testimony justifies the finding of the court that his business was practically destroyed by the acts of the Barragers, but we are not entirely convinced that there is any testimony which warranted the court in fixing the amount of damages sustained by respondent at the sum of $2,750. The price fixed by the bill of sale which defendant was to pay was $4,115 in cash, and the check of $2,750. There is no dispute upon this point. The property transferred by the bill of sale was "the goods, chattels, and personal property of every kind and nature now on hand and used or heretofore used in the business commonly known as the Cabin Beverage Company, located at 1200 West Fifty-Eighth street, in the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, state of California, together with all machinery, equipment, and formulas used in making products handled or used by the said business as well as all fixtures, paraphernalia used therein, including all barrels, kegs, one Ford roadster, and one Moreland truck, as well as all outstanding accounts, notes, bills, payable due to them and all debts and obligations due and owing to them or either of them, including all things used and connected in any way with the said business, including all cash in bank belonging to the said firm, including also the lease on the real property and all leases on all property now or heretofore used or owned in connection with the said business, including also all personal property specially set forth in the schedule hereto attached marked 'Exhibit A', and made a part hereof. It being understood and agreed that the lease of the real estate heretofore described will be assigned to the said Walls simultaneously with this transfer, and the said vendors agree to assign and deliver all accounts, notes, bills, and other papers concerning the said business, together with the business and good will of the said business heretofore conducted by the said vendors at the place aforesaid."

This property was sold as a whole for the stipulated sum of $6,865; the business and good will was only a part of the property to be transferred. Conceding that the business was absolutely and totally destroyed, yet the respondent still had in his possession, as a result of the purchase from appellant, a large amount of personal property, consisting, among other things, of a Moreland truck, a Ford roadster, machinery, equipment, and fixtures, outstanding accounts, cash in bank, and leases of real property.

It may be conceded that proof of the agreed price of the property sold is a prima facie showing of its value, yet we have in this action proof of the agreed price of the whole of the property sold when damages are sought for the loss of only a part of it. It may be true, as contended by respondent, that plaintiff alleged in paragraph III of her complaint that the $2,750 was agreed to be paid for "all the interest of plaintiff, of, in and to said business." The court found paragraph III to be true. The court further found that defendant purchased the whole of the property described in the bill of sale for the sum of $4,115 in cash and the check for $2,750, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $6,865. There was no evidence, nor was it claimed during the trial, that the sum of $2,750 or any specific amount was paid for the business and good will, separate and apart from the consideration paid for all the property described in the bill of sale. On the other hand, the testimony shows that the property was sold and agreed to be paid for as a whole, and in our opinion the findings are to be so construed.

It follows, therefore, that the record fails to show that there was any evidence to justify the finding that defendant was damaged in the sum of $2,750. All the other findings of the court are sustained by the evidence, and it is not necessary to disturb any of them. It will be necessary, however, that there be a new trial upon the issue as to the amount of damages sustained by defendant, and there should be a reversal for that purpose alone.

It is ordered that the judgment be reversed, and that the cause be remanded for a new trial on the issue as to the amount of damages sustained by the defendant, and for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

WILLIAMS et al. v. ANDREWS, Superior Court Judge, et al. (Civ. 4165.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 26, 1923.)

1. Courts ⚷472(2)—Appellate court can issue to compel certification of transcript for appeal to Supreme Court.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4, the jurisdiction of the appellate courts to issue mandates to inferior courts is concurrent with that of the Supreme Court, and the appellate court can issue the writ to require a judge of the superior court to certify a transcript, even though the case is one in which the Supreme Court only has jurisdiction of the appeal.

2. Mandamus ⚷14(2)—Delay in procuring transcript held to defeat right to mandamus to compel certification.

Where appellants' attorneys had presented a transcript to the clerk for presentation to the court for certification, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, but on the date fixed the judge was absent, and thereafter more than a year elapsed without appellant's counsel bringing the matter to the court's attention except by occasional inquiries of the clerk or judge, the delays in procuring action by the judge were unreasonable and gross laches, which defeats the right to compel the judge to certify the transcript.

Application for mandamus by Mina W. Williams and another against C. N. Andrews, as Judge of the Superior Court of the State of California, and J. B. McLees, County Clerk of San Diego County, to require certification of reporter's transcript and transmission of clerk's transcript and transmission of records. Mandamus for certification of transcript denied, and that for transmission of record to Supreme Court granted.

L. E. Dadmun, of San Diego, for petitioners.

Eugene Daney and Frederic W. Stearns, both of San Diego, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. This is a petition for a writ of mandate directing Hon. C. N. Andrews, judge of the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of San Diego, to certify to the truth and correctness of a reporter's transcript, and also directing that J. B. McLees, as clerk of the superior court of said San Diego county, transmit to the clerk of the Supreme Court of the state of California the clerk's transcript and records prepared in accordance with the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. A demurrer was interposed, which, while general in that it specifies that the petition does not state facts sufficient to authorize the issuance of the writ of mandate as prayed for, is also special in that it sets up alleged inexcusable delay on the part of petitioners in the matter of procuring the necessary certification of the transcript by the said judge of the trial court, as well as in procuring the transmittal to the said clerk of the Supreme Court of the said clerk's transcript and other documents therein referred to.

No question is raised as to the regularity of any of the proceedings in the cause leading up to the preparation of the reporter's transcript, and, in the absence of an answering affidavit as such covering the facts in the matter, it must be presumed that all statements contained in the affidavit accompanying the petition are true, and from which it appears, among other things, that within five days after the receipt by the clerk of the reporter's transcript the said clerk served by mail upon the plaintiffs and the defendants in said action a notice fixing the time for the presentation of the transcript to the court for its certification in accordance with the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, fixing a date for presenting said transcript for approval on the 3d day of September, 1921, at 10 o'clock a. m.; that on that date the judge of the trial court was absent on his vacation, and did not return until about the 1st day of October, 1921; that no objections were offered or made to the transcript by either the plaintiffs or the defendants, nor was there any suggestion or request made by either plaintiffs or defendants to insert in said transcript any matter not therein included; that upon the return of the trial judge he failed and neglected to certify to said transcript, and in the month of May, 1922, pursuant to a conversation with said judge, said petitioners requested the clerk of the department in which said judge presided to ascertain and to fix a date when it would be convenient to court and counsel for defendants to take up the matter of approving and certifying said transcript, but that neither the court nor the clerk at any time fixed any date pursuant to said request; that on the 15th day of January, 1923, in open court, and in the presence of the attorneys for defendants, plaintiffs insisted upon the court's fixing a time for the approval and certification of said transcript, and the court did then and there set and fix the time as the 22d day of January, 1923, at 2 o'clock p. m., on which date, all parties being present, on the objection of counsel for defendants, the court refused and declined to approve and certify said transcript.

[1] On the hearing of the alternative order made herein counsel for respondents made a motion, which was argued and submitted, to dismiss the writ on the ground, that if any appeal should be taken in the action, it was one which should be made to the Supreme Court, and for that reason the mandate, if any, should issue from the Supreme Court rather than from the District Court of Appeal. Section 4 of article 6 of the California Constitution directly confers such powers on District Courts of Appeal; and, while Chief Justice Beatty, in writing the opinion of the court in the case of Collins v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 264, 81 Pac. 509, made it plain that "when a case is such that an appeal from the judgment of the lower court would properly be taken to the District Court of Appeal, a petition to prohibit the proceeding should be addressed to that court," and that it was desired "in the outset to make a precedent to be followed in like cases" thereafter, in a later case entitled Matter of Application of Davidson, 167 Cal. 727, 141 Pac. 216, in which a petition for a writ of mandate was commenced in the District Court of Appeal, but, because that court was of the opinion that it had no jurisdiction of the matter by reason of the fact that it had no direct appellate jurisdiction of the cause pending in the superior court, the District Court of Appeal declined to act, and transferred the application to the Supreme Court, it was said that—

> "The Constitution gives the District Court of Appeal original jurisdiction of proceedings in mandamus, in language identical with that giving such jurisdiction to the Supreme Court. Its jurisdiction in such matters is, therefore, coequal with our own and does not depend upon the existence of appellate jurisdiction over the case to which the mandamus relates."

And in that case it was further ordered that the papers be forthwith returned to the District Court of Appeal, and that that court proceed "to a decision of the cause, as in other cases." In Favorite v. Superior Court, 181 Cal. 265, 184 Pac. 16, 8 A. L. R. 290, Judge Shaw, in speaking of the question of jurisdiction, used the following language:

> "There is no merit in the motion of respondent to quash the writ of prohibition issued by the district court. The motion was based on the claim that the case before the superior court was an action in equity—a case in which appellate jurisdiction is, by the Constitution, lodged in the first instance, in the Supreme Court alone (Const. art. 6, § 4), from which fact, it is argued, an original proceeding in prohibition to prevent action by the superior court in such a case is cognizable only in the Supreme Court. This assumption is not correct. The same section of the Constitution gives equal and concurrent jurisdiction to the district courts and to the Supreme Court to issue writs of prohibition in all proper cases. So far as jurisdiction to do so is concerned, the questions of appellate jurisdiction and of the nature of the action in which the act sought to be prohibited is threatened are entirely immaterial. As a matter of policy and practice, both this court and the district courts, respectively, have at times refused to take jurisdiction of an original proceeding where the case involved was in the superior court and was originally appealable to the other court. [Citing cases.] But this practice was not adopted because of any want of original jurisdiction in such cases in either court."

There are some decisions by Courts of Appeal of this state from which it would appear that in circumstances such as are here presented no jurisdiction exists in this court; but, while such decisions are persuasive, they are not controlling. As the matter is one of "policy and practice," the proper course, so it appears to this court, is indicated in the case of Reclamation District v. Ash (Cal. App.) 208 Pac. 394, where it is said that—

> "Having once issued the alternative writ and thus signified its willingness to entertain the proceeding, a District Court of Appeal will not dismiss such proceeding merely because the subject-matter to which the writ pertains is solely of equitable cognizance and of which the Supreme Court has exclusive appellate jurisdiction."

It therefore follows that the motion to dismiss must be denied.

The petitioners contend that upon the presentation to the judge of the reporter's transcript it was the duty of the judge to examine same, and, if found to be correct, to certify to the truth and correctness of the transcript. On the other hand, it is respondents' contention that, because the judge failed and neglected to certify to said transcript within a reasonable time, the duty devolved upon petitioners to take immediate action in the matter; to which petitioners reply that, petitioners having done everything required of them by law, they could not be held responsible for the failure or neglect or laches of the officers of the court in performing their duty. The delay in finally bringing the matter to the attention of the court covered a period of over 16 months, and, while petitioners contend that it was not their duty to see to it that the transcript was certified within a reasonable time, as an answer to the charge of negligence preferred against them by respondents, petitioners show by their affidavits that after the 3d day of September, 1921 (which was the date originally fixed by the clerk for having the transcript certified and approved by the judge, and which matter could not receive the attention of the judge by reason of the fact that he was away on his vacation, from which he returned on about October 1, 1921), and on the 13th day of October, 1921, counsel for petitioners left the city of San Diego for the city of Washington, D. C., on legal business which occupied his time until November 23, 1921, when he returned to the city of San Diego, at which time he made inquiry of the judge's clerk, and was informed by him that the transcript had not been approved; that thereafter he spoke to the judge about approving said transcript, but was again called to Washington, D. C., on the 3d day of January, 1922, and did not return to San Diego until the 25th day of February, 1922; that between the 13th and the 16th days of March, 1922, he was engaged in the trial of a case in the county of Imperial; that thereafter he again made inquiry of the judge's clerk as to whether the transcript had been approved, but was again informed that it had not been approved; that thereupon, which was during either the month of May or the month of June, 1922, he spoke to the judge about approving the transcript, to which the judge replied that he did not wish to do so unless the attorneys for the respondents were present; whereupon counsel for petitioners requested the judge to fix some time for considering the matter, to which the judge replied that any time when he was not engaged, and which would be convenient to both sides, would be satisfactory to him; that thereupon counsel for petitioners requested the judge's clerk to fix a date that would be convenient to the court and to notify counsel for petitioners and counsel for respondents as to the time so fixed; that thereafter, on or about the 15th day of January, 1923, counsel for petitioners, in the presence of counsel for respondents, requested the judge to take up the matter of approving said transcript, at which time the judge set the date for certifying and approving the same as of January 22, 1923.

The provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to this matter, are to the effect that, after the transcript has been filed with the clerk of the court, it shall be his duty to forthwith give the attorneys appearing in said cause notice that said transcript has been filed, and stating the time at which the transcript will be presented to the judge for his approval and certification. A consideration of some of the authorities shows as follows: The case of Town of Mill Valley v. Massachusetts Bonding & Insurance Co. (Cal. Sup.) 207 Pac. 253, involved, among other things, the delay of the stenographic reporter in preparing a transcript of the testimony within the statutory period, which delay was shown to have been unavoidable because of the extreme length of the transcript. It was held that, even if the stenographic reporter had been negligent in the preparation of the transcript, such default should not be properly charged to appellant, and the court said:

> "When proceeding under section 953a the appellant must rely on the official conduct of the officers of the court. Their delay or default is not his delay or default."

In Jansson v. National Steamship Co. (Cal. Sup.) 208 Pac. 90, plaintiff presented the objection that no statement on motion for new trial had been prepared, settled, and filed at the time the motion for new trial was heard by the trial court. The record discloses that the defendant's time to serve its proposed bill of exceptions was extended to March 29, 1915, and that a copy thereof was served upon plaintiff prior to the expiration of such extension; that thereafter, on April 30, 1915, plaintiff served on defendant a copy of his proposed amendments to defendant's proposed bill; that on May 8, 1915, and within time, defendant notified plaintiff that defendant rejected the latter's amendments, and that on said date the proposed bill and amendments were presented to the court for settlement. In considering that point the court said, among other things:

> "When once in the hands of the clerk for the judge or court, the law does not specifically declare the time within which the judge must act upon it. The delay of the judge, if any, in settling the bill of exceptions, cannot, under circumstances such as are present here, be attributed to the moving party or his attorney, and he should not be made to suffer by reason thereof. It is the duty of the moving party to present the proposed bill and amendments, * * * and that is exactly what was done here."

An Idaho case, entitled Johnson v. Ensign, reported in 34 Idaho, 374, 201 Pac. 723, is also in point. It is there held that, when a reporter's transcript is seasonably delivered to the trial judge for settlement, it is the duty of the judge promptly to settle it, and that, under the statute covering the matter, after a transcript is duly delivered to the trial judge for settlement, he becomes the actor; that the law imposes upon him the duty of giving such notice as may be required, and of settling the transcript when it is in such condition that he can properly settle it. The Idaho statute governing the matter provided that—

> "The transcript, with any notice designating errors, shall be transmitted to the judge who tried the cause, * * * and such judge shall forthwith settle the same, notifying the parties by such notice as he deems adequate of the time and place of settlement." C. S. § 6886.

It will be noted in the case of Town of Mill Valley v. Massachusetts Bonding and Insurance Co., supra, that, while the matter under consideration was only the failure of the stenographic reporter to prepare the transcript of the testimony within the statutory period, the court dealt generally with the question when it said that appellant must rely upon the official conduct of the officers of the court, and that their delay or default was not his delay or default. In such a case, after an appellant has procured the necessary order for the transcription of the testimony, there is nothing further possible that appellants may do in the premises. The work to be done is of such a personal character that the reporter who takes the testimony is the only person who can with any degree of accuracy transcribe his notes. If it be impracticable for him to perform his duties in that respect within the time prescribed by the statute, certainly the appellant ought not to be prejudiced thereby. The delay in such a case is excusable; but the facts in the case referred to do not fit the facts in the instant case. In Jansson v. National Steamship Co., supra, while the date when the bill of exceptions was presented to the court for settlement is shown, there is nothing in the opinion which indicates that there was any delay on the part of the judge in settling the bill of exceptions other than that the bill had not been settled at the time the motion for new trial was heard, and the court ruled that, inasmuch as the bill had been approved and was on file at the date of the making of the order, such hearing, at most, was a mere irregularity, and in no way injurious to plaintiff. The language of the court that, under the circumstances as were then presented, the delay of the judge could not be attributed to the appellant, while helpful in the instant case, is not conclusive. In the Idaho case the ruling depended primarily upon the mandatory provisions of the statute requiring the judge on receipt of the reporter's transcript, with the "notice designating errors," to forthwith settle the same and to notify the parties by such notice as he deemed adequate of the time and place of settlement. The great difference between such a statute and section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, is that section 953a contains no provision with reference either to the time when the judge shall certify to the reporter's transcript nor regarding the giving of any notice by the judge to any of the parties to the action; hence the decision in the Idaho case is not particularly apt.

The California cases dealing with the other side of the question are to the effect that it is the duty of the appellant at all times to take whatever steps may be necessary to bring the matter to the attention of the court, and to show some excuse or explanation for any delay in taking such steps.

In Miller v. Queen Insurance Co., 2 Cal. App. 267, 83 Pac. 287, it appeared, as in the case at bar, that the first delay in settling the bill of exceptions was caused by the absence of the trial judge. After his return no action was taken in the matter for perhaps four months, at the expiration of which time, and for a period of another month, the attorneys met with the judge at intervals, and attempted to agree upon a settlement of the proposed bill, however without success. A delay of five months thereafter then occurred, when a motion was made by plaintiff to dismiss defendant's motion for a new trial. The court said:

> "Upon the foregoing facts the burden was thrown upon the defendant to show some excuse or explanation for its delay in taking the steps requisite for enabling the court to hear and determine its motion for a new trial, including the settlement and filing of the bill of exceptions setting forth the matters upon which the motion was to be heard; otherwise, the court would be authorized to hold that it had not acted with due diligence and to grant the motion of the plaintiff. The defendant was the moving party in the proceeding for a new trial, and the burden was at all times upon it to take whatever steps were necessary to enable the court to hear its motion. Kubli v. Hawkett, 89 Cal. 638, 27 Pac. 57; San Jose Land Co. v. Allen, 129 Cal. 247, 61 Pac. 1083; Mowry v. Weisenborn, 137 Cal. 110, 69 Pac. 971; Galbraith v. Lowe, 142 Cal. 295, 75 Pac. 831."

In the companion case of Miller v. American Central Insurance Co., 2 Cal. App. 273, 83 Pac. 290, the court said:

> "The fact that the judge was absent from the city at the time the engrossment was completed, and for several days thereafter, did not relieve the defendant from the necessity of diligence in ascertaining the date of his return and in seeking to procure his authentication to the bill."

In this connection it should be remembered that the duties of the judge are much more emphatically expressed in the statute relating to the settlement of bills of exception (Code Civ. Proc. § 650) than they are provided for in the statute covering the approval and the certification of the reporter's transcript (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a). In the former the statute is that, "when received from the clerk, the judge must designate the time at which he will settle the bill. * * * At the time designated, the judge must settle the bill"—while in the latter statute no direct duty devolves upon the judge, excepting that "at the time specified in the notice of the clerk to the attorneys said transcript shall be presented to the judge for his approval," etc.

Having to do with the duty of an appellant in a matter of this kind, it is said, in Estate of Depeaux, 118 Cal. 523, 50 Pac. 683, that—

> "It is the duty of the party seeking to avail himself of a bill of exceptions, for the purpose of obtaining a review of the action of the superior court, to take whatever steps may be necessary to procure its settlement."

And in Smith v. Jaccard, 20 Cal. App. 280,[1] it is held that it is the duty of an appellant as the moving party to take the necessary steps to procure the filing of the reporter's transcript, and for want of diligence on the part of appellant in that regard the court has power to terminate proceedings for procuring such transcript. Galbraith v. Lowe, 142 Cal. 297, 75 Pac. 831, and Dorcy v. Brodis, 153 Cal. 675, 96 Pac. 278, are authorities to the effect that—

[1] 128 Pac. 1023, 1026.

> "The motion for a new trial is an independent proceeding in an action, in which the burden of acting is at all times upon the moving party."

And as having a bearing upon this phase of the question, see Moore v. Kendall, 121 Cal. 145, 53 Pac. 647.

The petitioners' delays in the instant case cover a period of over 16 months. After the judge's return on October 1, 1921, from his vacation, a period of 12 days elapsed before counsel for petitioners left San Diego for Washington, D. C. Upon his return to San Diego, on November 23, 1921, nothing was done by him in connection with getting the transcript approved by the judge other than the making of a single inquiry of the judge's clerk whether or not it had been done. Matters remained in statu quo until January 3, 1922, a period of about 6 weeks, when counsel for petitioners again went to Washington, D. C., from which place he again returned to San Diego on February 25, 1922, where he remained quiescent, so far as this matter was concerned, until the 13th of March, 1922, when he was absent from San Diego for a period of three days. On his return he again contented himself with making an inquiry of the judge's clerk, who informed him that the transcript had not been approved. Nothing further appears to have been done by counsel for a period of 2 or 3 months, when he took occasion to speak to the judge about approving the transcript, to which the judge replied that he did not wish to do so unless the attorneys for respondents were present. Counsel then requested the judge's clerk to fix a date for hearing the matter, and to notify attorneys on either side thereof; but nothing was actually done thereafter by anybody connected with the case until the 15th day of January, 1923, a period covering at least 7 months.

[2] As has been indicated, the weight of authority is to the effect that the burden is cast upon the appellant in a matter of procuring the approval and certification by the judge of the reporter's transcript. That he must act diligently in that regard is beyond question. Petitioners' delays in procuring action by the judge were unreasonable and are not satisfactorily explained. Petitioners have been guilty of gross laches in the premises, and are not entitled to the relief which they seek at the hands of this court. In the circumstances the judge of the lower court was right in refusing his approval and certification of the transcript.

Neither argument nor authority has been presented by either side with reference to the propriety of the issuance of the writ prayed for as to respondent J. B. McLees, acting in the capacity of clerk of the superior court, requiring him to transmit to the clerk of the Supreme Court the clerk's transcript and records prepared in accordance with the provisions of the statute. As to that feature of the matter, no reason being assigned for its refusal, it is ordered that the writ issue as prayed; otherwise the issuance of the writ prayed for is denied.

Mandamus ⚷10—Facts held not to show unreasonable delay defeating right to have transcript settled.

Where the circumstances under which the settling of a transcript by the trial judge was delayed do not show such unreasonable delay as to relieve the court of its duty to settle the transcript, a peremptory writ of mandamus will be ordered to require such settlement.

Application by Mina W. Williams and another against C. N. Andrews, as Judge of the Superior Court of San Diego County, and others to require settlement of the transcript. Writ granted.

L. E. Dadmun, of San Diego, for petitioners.

Eugene Daney and Fred W. Stearns, both of San Diego, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. It appears to the court from the petition herein that there has been no unreasonable delay under the circumstances stated in the petition, and that it was the duty of the court to settle the transcript. A peremptory writ of mandamus will be ordered.

SEARLES v. GONZALEZ et al.
(L. A. 7436.)

1. Limitation of actions ⚷148(3)—Written acknowledgment tolling statute may be check connected by parol with notice of interest.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 360, a written acknowledgment signed by the party to be charged, may be the check of the debtor sent to the creditor in an envelope containing notice of interest, of the amount of the check, due on a note, which notice had been sent by the creditor, such connecting facts being shown by parol.

2. Limitation of actions ⚷143(2)—Generally joint obligor's promise does not toll statute against the others.

Generally a promise by one joint obligor does not toll the statute as against the others.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Edgar A. Luce, Judge.

Action by James H. Searles against Ella Ibs Gonzalez, with cross-complaint against plaintiff and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Ralph E. Jenney and Wirt Francis, both of San Diego, for appellant.

W. J. Mossholder, of San Diego, for respondent.

H. W. Scheld, of San Diego, for cross-defendants.

WASTE, J. The plaintiff brought this action to quiet title to certain real property. The defendant answered and filed a cross-complaint setting up an unpaid note and mortgage executed by the plaintiff's grantors, who were made cross-defendants. On its face the note was barred by the statute of limitations, but the defendant alleged that the makers thereof had, at various times, "acknowledged to this defendant their certain indebtedness to her and promised to pay the same, which said acknowledgments and promises were contained in several writings signed by said cross-defendants." She prayed for foreclosure of the mortgage and for deficiency judgment against the makers of the note. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

[1] The only issue raised by the pleadings and tried in the court below relates to the application of section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that no acknowledgment or promise is sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract, by which to take the case out of the operation of the statute of limitations, unless the acknowledgment or promise is contained in some writing, signed by the party to be charged thereby.

The evidence is uncontradicted. On the 9th day of April, 1914, the cross-defendants, Leroy H. and Nani A. Arnold, executed and delivered to the appellant, Mrs. Gonzalez, a certain promissory note for the sum of $5,000, bearing date on that day, and due three years after date, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly. As security for the payment of such note, they executed a mortgage on the real property described in the complaint, the lien of which plaintiff seeks to remove in this action. Mrs. Gonzalez placed the note and mortgage for collection with the Southern Trust & Commerce Bank of San Diego, which institution, it is admitted, acted as her agent in dealing with Arnold during the entire transaction. Arnold testified that he kept track of the quarterly interest payments through regular interest notices sent to him by the bank just shortly prior to the payments becoming due. He thereupon wrote his check to the bank for the exact amount of quarterly interest due, $100, and "inclosed the notice in an envelope with the check and mailed it to the bank; that was the general procedure;" or he took the notice and check in person to the bank. He continued this practice until some time in the year 1921. On one occasion, on October 13, 1917, not having received the interest notice, he wrote the Southern Trust & Commerce Bank of San Diego as follows:

> "I have received no notice from you regarding interest on my note to Mrs. Maguil Gonzalez for $5000.00 which I believe was due Oct. 9, 1917.
> "I have always received a notice from you and paid the interest at your bank.
> "I inclose check for the amount, $100.00. If you still have the note please apply it on same if not please return it to me and inform me if possible to whom it is to be paid."

No other writings relating to the matter were ever signed by either Arnold or his wife, and no other acknowledgments or references to the indebtedness appear to have been contained in any writings that passed between the parties connected with the transaction. In January, 1922, the Arnolds transferred the mortgaged property to the plaintiff, who immediately brought the action against Mrs. Gonzalez to quiet title to the property. The foregoing facts were established at the trial, but when the note and mortgage were offered in evidence by the cross-complainant, the trial court sustained an objection that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations on April 9, 1921. The judgment is an affirmance of that contention.

When the plaintiff bought the property and instituted this suit, the records showed that the lien of the mortgage had become extinguished. Civ. Code, § 2911. The judgment must therefore be affirmed, unless the right of action on the note had been kept alive and enforceable by some means legally effective to toll the running of the statute of limitations. Appellant seeks to obtain a reversal by contending that when Arnold, one of the makers of the note, signed his personal checks for the exact amounts of the installments of quarterly interest and delivered those checks to the bank as agent for the appellant, accompanied by the notices which the bank had sent to him and which referred to the note, giving the amount and description thereof, and the amount of interest due, the transaction amounted to an acknowledgment in writing sufficient to comply with the requirements of the statute, and constituted sufficient evidence of a new and continuing contract on his part, which removed the case out of the operation of the statute of limitations. Some of the checks, accompanied by the notices, were made and sent or delivered to the bank prior to the expiration of the limitation of the note, and some were made and sent after the lapse of that time. The last one was dated January 12, 1921. The checks themselves, of which there were some 25, contain no express reference to any note or obligation, or any notation indicating for what purpose they were given. The record discloses that the notices sent quarterly to Arnold, and returned by him, were the bank's "regular interest notice, a form * * * filled out saying interest will be due on the 9th of such a month * * * upon a note for $5,000." On the objection of the plaintiff, further evidence of the contents of the notices was shut out by the ruling of the trial court.

The checks, by themselves, do not meet the requirements of section 360. Clunin v. First Fed. Trust Co. (Cal. Sup.) 207 Pac. 1009, 1011. In that case it was claimed that the case was taken out of the operation of the statute of limitations by checks signed by the debtor payable to the order of the holder of the note, together with the memoranda made by the debtor on the stubs to which the checks were attached at the time they were made, showing the amount of the check and the purpose for which it was given. This court held that the stubs of the checks did not constitute an acknowledgment or promise sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations, since they were never communicated to the creditor. The checks were held an insufficient acknowledgment, because they made no reference to the existence of any debt, and contained no language which could be said to be uncertain in its meaning and subject to explanation by the aid of extrinsic circumstances so as to be made to refer to a debt. In reaching its conclusion in that case the court examined and analyzed the leading cases theretofore decided in this state, and held, as a general rule of construction, that no writing is sufficient as an acknowledgment under section 360 unless it contains some reference to a debt, which, either of itself or with the aid of permissible evidence of extrinsic facts in explanation, amounts to an admission that there is a debt existing to the creditor to whom the writing is sent, for which the debtor is liable and willing to pay.

Two pertinent facts in the Clunin Case differentiate it from the case at bar. There the checks were separated from the stubs to which they were originally attached, and on which appear the memoranda of the purpose for which they were executed; and they were not accompanied by any letter or other writing. The notations on the stubs were not in any manner communicated to the holder of the note. None of the checks was for the exact amount of interest due, but all included sums for other purposes.

It is well established that the Code section does not prescribe any form in which an acknowledgment or promise sufficient to lift the ban of the statute of limitations shall be made. It is sufficient if it shows the writer treats the indebtedness as subsisting and one which the debtor is liable and willing to pay. From this acknowledgment the law implies the promise to pay. Concannon v. Smith, 134 Cal. 14, 20, 66 Pac. 40; Foster v. Bowles, 138 Cal. 346, 351, 71 Pac. 494, 649; Clunin v. First Fed. Trust Co., supra. Such acknowledgment or promise may be made to an agent of the creditor or to some person authorized to receive it. Wood on Limitations (4th Ed.) § 81c; Taylor v. Hendrie, 8 Nev. 243. A memorandum or promise, binding under the statute of frauds, may be gathered from several writings between the parties with reference to the subject-matter and so connected with each other that they may fairly be said to constitute one paper relating to the contract. Concannon v. Smith, supra; Ryan v. United States, 136 U. S. 68, 10 Sup. Ct. 913, 34 L. Ed. 447; Elbert v. L. A. Gas Co., 97 Cal. 244, 32 Pac. 9; Brewer v. Horst & Lachmund Co., 127 Cal. 643, 60 Pac. 418, 50 L. R. A. 240. While the memorandum must express the essential elements of the contract with reasonable certainty, these may be gathered either from the terms of the memorandum itself or from some other paper or papers therein referred to. If one of a series of papers which appear to have some relation to the same matter is signed by the party to be charged, this is enough, as all the papers are to be considered together as forming one contract or memorandum. There is no doubt, also, that parol evidence is admissible to identify any paper referred to. Freeland v. Ritz, 154 Mass. 257, 259, 28 N. E. 226, 12 L. R. A. 561, 26 Am. St. Rep. 244. Any rule to the contrary is not now conceded to be absolute. There may be instances in which it would be a violation of reason and common sense to ignore a reference which derives its significance from parol proof. Beckwith v. Talbot, 95 U. S. 289, 292 (24 L. Ed. 496). In such cases parol evidence of contemporaneous facts and of the circumstances in which the parties were when the writings were signed will be received to show their connection. What constitutes a "reference" in such cases?

> "The old rule, by which no other paper could be used to help out the memorandum unless incorporated into it by reference in the memorandum itself, * * * is no longer followed. The connection between different papers, so that they may be considered together and their sufficiency be determined by the contents of all of them may be proved by oral evidence, at least so far as it is the result of that evidence to establish the fact that all of the different papers which are so to be considered together were brought to the attention of both parties, and were linked together in their minds, so that the parties themselves may be found to have adopted all the papers as the expression of their purpose. This is the effect of the recent cases." Nickerson v. Weld, 204 Mass. 346, 90 N. E. 589.

The relation of one paper to another must appear upon the face of the writings relied upon, but it may appear in either of two ways. It may appear by express reference or from the nature of the contents. Swallow v. Strong, 83 Minn. 87, 92, 85 N. W. 942. One writing may be connected with another either expressly or by internal evidence of subject-matter and occasion. Marks v. Cowdin, 226 N. Y. 138, 145, 123 N. E. 139. It matters not what may have been the immediate purpose for which some of the writings may have been prepared, or that one of them may be unsigned. All that the statute requires is written evidence from which the whole contract may be made out. St. L., I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Beidler, 45 Ark. 17, 28.

> "It has been held that if all the writings adduced to establish the contract, when viewed together in the light of the conditions and circumstances of the parties at the time they were written, show unmistakably that they relate to the same matter and constitute the several parts of one connected transaction, so that there can be no other reasonable conclusion, from the evidence thus afforded, than that they were written with reference to those concurrent or preceding, there is such a reference of one to the other as satisfies the rule, although there is no reference in express terms; and parol evidence is admissible to show the circumstances under which the transaction occurred, and to connect the several papers constituting the contract between the parties. Strouse v. Elting, 110 Ala. 132. See also Jenkins v. Harrison, 66 Ala. 345; White v. Breen, 106 Ala. 159." 2 Ann. Cas. 294.
> "The rule is one founded in reason; and when, as practical men, we look at the writings and see, inhering in them, evidence which entirely satisfies the mind that they all relate to one general transaction, there is no reason why they should not be so considered. There is in such case a direct reference of the one to the other within the meaning of the law." White v. Breen, 106 Ala. 159, 19 South. 59, 32 L. R. A. 127, supra.

In Raubitschek v. Blank, 80 N. Y. 478, the defendant and H. negotiated for the exchange of certain real estate. The terms were agreed upon verbally by them. The defendant gave H. a check for $500 as payment, receiving therefor a receipt signed by H. In an action upon the check it was contended that there was no consideration for the check in that no contract within the statute of frauds had resulted from the transaction. The court held that the mutual relation of the receipt and check "appeared upon their face quite as clearly as it does where a letter has been written which contains the terms of contract and there is an acceptance," saying further, "It is sufficient if when taken together, a contract is made out, and there may be an identification of the documents."

Parol testimony was properly admitted to show the circumstances under which the instruments relied upon were executed, how the parties acted with reference to them after they were executed, and what they did with them. It then remained to be determined what was the effect of the writings when considered together. Flegel v. Dowling, 54 Or. 40, 102 Pac. 178, 135 Am. St. Rep. 812, 19 Ann. Cas. 1159. With the identity of the writings established, it was material to appellant's cause that she be permitted to show the exact nature and contents of the interest notices sent by her agent, the bank, to Arnold. If it should be made to appear that the notices, even though printed, with blanks filled out, were in the nature of communications addressed to defendant Arnold notifying him that on a date certain interest to the amount of $100 would be due from him by reason of an indebtedness aptly described and identified, and the notices bore the name or subscription of the bank, such writings and the checks promptly returned to the bank by the defendant Arnold, as was his custom for many years, will show, when considered together, that they relate to the same matter and constitute several parts of one connected transaction. They were, without question, linked together in the minds of the parties to such an extent that they must be found to have adopted the notices and checks as the expression of their purpose. Nickerson v. Weld, supra. From the relation thus established, there is such a reference of one to the other as satisfies the statutory requirement. 2 Ann. Cas. 293.

It does not appear that the checks signed by Arnold and the interest notices from the bank were pinned together, or in any way fastened to each other. But this was immaterial, for, in order to reach the bank when mailed, they were inclosed in an envelope, which so connected the two that, under all the circumstances, they may be taken together in each instance as one memorandum. Pearce v. Gardner, 1 Q. B. D. [1897] 688.

[2] The letter of October 13, 1917, written by Arnold to the bank, considered together with the check for the interest then due, which accompanied it, extended the statute of limitations on the note, as to him, four years from that time, or until October 13, 1921. This action was not commenced until after that date. The last of the quarterly checks was dated January 12, 1921. It was therefore necessary for the appellant to fully establish the existence of a sufficient acknowledgment or promise to take the case out of the operation of the statute of frauds. It was error to exclude the evidence by which appellant sought to establish the facts. Without such record the trial court was unable to fully determine whether, as matter of law (Concannon v. Smith, supra), a new and existing promise or acknowledgment was raised which took the case out of the operation of the statute. If it finds there was such an acknowledgment, it will also be necessary for it to determine whether or not the admission or promise by Leroy H. Arnold, one of the joint obligors, operated to suspend the running of the statute as against his wife, Nani A. Arnold. As a general statement, the promise of one of several joint obligors cannot avail to revive as against the others a cause of action barred by limitation, or to suspend the running of the statute. State Loan, etc., Co. v. Cochran, 130 Cal. 245, 255, 62 Pac. 466, 600. In the absence of evidence of agency for the purpose between Arnold and Mrs. Arnold, the judgment in Mrs. Arnold's favor would ordinarily be affirmed. Belloc v. Davis, 38 Cal. 242, 256; Titus v. Annis, 77 N. H. 478, 93 Atl. 114. But, as the point was not raised by either party here, and as the case must be sent back for a new trial as to Arnold, it may as well be tried anew as to both cross-defendants. There are circumstances under which a mortgage executed by a husband and wife may be foreclosed, though an action against the wife to recover the debt is barred. Wood on Limitations (4th Ed.) § 81d (4).

The judgment is reversed.

REES et al. v. REES et al. (L. A. 7369.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 5, 1923.)

1. Deeds 🔑208(5)—Evidence held to show that delivery was not intended to be irrevocable.

Evidence of the delivery of a deed to the grantor's attorney with instructions to deliver it to his wife, the grantee, upon his death, and subsequent acts, held to show that such delivery was not intended to be irrevocable.

2. Evidence 🔑417(17)—Acts and statements of grantor admissible to prove or disprove efficient delivery in escrow of deed.

On the question of whether an efficient delivery in escrow of a deed has been made, evidence of the grantor's acts and statements during the entire time of the escrow may be proven.

3. Deeds 🔑211(4)—Evidence held sufficient to establish undue influence and coercion in securing execution.

Evidence that the wife of one suffering from a stroke of paralysis, within a week thereafter and after a second stroke, secured the execution of deeds granting to her about three times the property she would otherwise have been entitled to in the event of grantor's death, while the grantor was mentally and physically weak and debilitated, held to establish that the deeds were procured by undue influence and coercion.

Rees, tried as one action, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint joining as cross-defendants children of Lewis Rees, deceased. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Smith & Breslin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. D. Van Nostram and C. Ibeson Sweet, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in an action to set aside certain deeds on the ground that as to one it was not delivered and as to the others that they were procured by undue influence.

Mary L. Rees was the third wife of Lewis Rees. They were married October 2, 1907. Lewis Rees died March 2, 1920, at the age of 80 years. At the time of his death he left surviving him six children by a former marriage. His widow, Mary L. Rees, had one daughter living, issue of a former marriage. She had no children by Lewis Rees. On the 3d day of September, 1919, Lewis Rees made and acknowledged a deed of gift to Mary

L. Rees, his wife, of twelve parcels of real property situated in Los Angeles county. On the same day, with the knowledge of his wife, Lewis Rees deposited this deed with his attorney, Joseph Smith, with instructions to hold it until his death and then to deliver the same to Mary L. Rees. On September 17, 1919, Lewis Rees made eight other deeds of gift, conveying the same property described in the deed of September 3. Two of these deeds conveyed to his wife six parcels of said real property, and were delivered directly to her on the day the deeds bear date. The other six deeds conveyed six lots to his children.

After the death of Lewis Rees the special administrators of his estate commenced an action against Mary L. Rees to set aside and cancel the two deeds of September 17 in her favor, on the ground that Lewis Rees was at the time of executing the same mentally incompetent to execute such deeds, and that the execution thereof was procured through the undue influence of said grantee. At the time of filing that action none of the children of deceased, including the special administrators, had any knowledge whatever of the existence of the deed of September 3. On the day the summons and complaint were served on Mary L. Rees in that action she caused to be recorded the deed of September 3, conveying to her all the real property theretofore belonging to Lewis Rees. Thereupon the plaintiffs commenced a second action to set aside and cancel the deed of September 3; the allegations in this action being practically the same as those in the first one, and further alleging that all of the property conveyed in the deed of September 3 was the property of the estate of decedent, and asking that the title thereto be quieted. Mary L. Rees answered both complaints, specifically denying all the material allegations therein, and filed a cross-complaint in both actions, alleging that she was the owner of all of the said property, and asked that title thereto be quieted in her. In filing her cross-complaint Mary L. Rees brought in all of the children of the deceased, and they individually answered the cross-complaint, denying the material allegations therein. By stipulation these actions were consolidated for trial.

The trial court found that the deed of September 3 had never been delivered by Lewis Rees to Mary L. Rees. The court further found that on September 10, 1919, Lewis Rees suffered a severe stroke of apoplexy, which, although not rendering him totally incompetent to transact business, still left him in a very weak and debilitated mental and physical condition; that prior to suffering the stroke of apoplexy Lewis Rees had great confidence in his wife; that she took advantage of his condition and the confidence he reposed in her and unduly influenced him to deliver to her the two deeds of September 17.

[1] The only question seriously discussed in the briefs is: Does the evidence sustain the findings of the trial court? We think it does. Referring to the deed of September 3, it is clear that the evidence supports the finding that the decedent did not intend to deliver that deed without the power of revocation. His conduct, as well as the conduct of defendant after the deed was made, supports this view. Two weeks after the making of that deed Lewis Rees, with the consent and approval of Mary L. Rees, made a different disposition of the property, and thereafter and until the action to set aside the deeds to plaintiff of September 17 was commenced, she relied entirely on the latter deeds. According to her testimony she had not questioned his right and power to make and deliver the deeds of September 17. In fact, these deeds to the children were not only signed by her, but according to evidence in the case, they were made at her request. In one instance she said she had been working for a month to have him make those deeds to his children. At another time, when one of the children hesitated to accept a deed, she said: "You keep still; accept that deed; I worked on your father all night to get him to make it."

It also appears in evidence that Lewis Rees called his children to what proved to be his deathbed, and stated in the presence of his wife that she was to have only a life estate in the property conveyed to her, and that after her death the property was to be divided among his children and her daughter, share and share alike. Certainly he would not have done this if he had intended to make an absolute conveyance of his property to Mary L. Rees. The surrounding circumstances, the conduct of the parties after the making of the deed of September 3, all indicate that Lewis Rees never intended to part with the dominion over his property. It is quite likely, as said by the trial court, that he intended to do with his property as many do, make a deed effective upon his death but subject in the meantime to his control and dominion.

[2] All this evidence was clearly admissible. It was relevant and material to show the intention of the deceased as to the question of delivery:

> "Where the very question is whether or not the alleged grantor has parted with his title by making an efficient delivery of his deed, his acts and statements material to the question of delivery during the entire period of the escrow may be proven." Smith v. Smith, 173 Cal. 725, 161 Pac. 495; Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 648, 151 Pac. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703.

[3] Coming now to the deed of September 17, concerning which the court found that it was obtained by Mary L. Rees from Lewis Rees by undue influence and coercion, the evidence shows that he had been seriously ill for some little time before he suffered the stroke of paralysis on September 10, and it cannot be gainsaid that from that time until his death he was mentally and physically weak and debilitated. Indeed, before the making of the deed of September 17 he had suffered a second stroke. During most of the time after he was first stricken he was helpless, and he required to be "cared for like a baby." Mentally he appeared to have lost his initiative. As a rule he would speak only when spoken to, and then answered only in monosyllables.

It was Mrs. Rees who suggested the making of the deeds and, doubtless, the distribution of the property. It was she who secured the blank forms of deed, who sent for the notary public to fill out the blanks and to acknowledge the conveyances, and who in most of the instances delivered the deeds to the respective grantees. She initiated, took charge of, and conducted the entire matter of the distribution of the property and obtained thereof for herself property worth about $49,000, while the children collectively received property worth about $4,000, thus receiving about three times the amount to which she would otherwise be entitled, for the property was the separate property of the deceased, and he died intestate.

Doubtless it was the understanding between Lewis Rees and his wife that she should enjoy the property conveyed to her for the period of her life with remainder over to her daughter and to his children, for he in effect so stated to his children in her presence and hearing, and by her silence she acquiesced in what he there said. In fact, a few days after the death of Lewis Rees she was asked by Henry J. Hortsman, her brother-in-law, if she had made "a will as Lewis wanted you to do," and she said, "I made one, but destroyed it." On at least two occasions Mr. Hortsman urged Mary L. Rees to make a will leaving the property to her daughter and to the children of the deceased, as had been intended, "and to take the widow's share." To this advice she gave no heed, and on the occasion of the last conversation she said that, "I have it [the property], and why should I give it up?" She also requested Hortsman and his wife to forget what they had heard and not to tell all they knew, referring to a conversation heard by them between her and the deceased as to what was to be done with the property.

The testimony of the appellant was not the testimony of a person innocent of the charges made in the complaint. She asserted and denied matters later contradicted or admitted, which conduct showed a guilty conscience.

There are several places in the record where it appears that hers was the dominating will so far as the deceased was concerned. It appeared that the deceased had become old and feeble; that his physical and mental powers were weak and waning; that he was an easy victim for a designing person in whom he had confidence; and it further sufficiently appears that the defendant, his wife, influenced him to make the deed to her by promising to make a will leaving the property to her daughter and to his six children. This promise she did not keep and she apparently never intended to keep it.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLARD et al. v. DOBBINS et al. (L. A. 7071.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 18, 1923.[1] Rehearing Denied July 16, 1923.)

1. Corporations ⚷361—Evidence held sufficient to show prima facie that directors were liable to a judgment creditor of the corporation.

Where the answer admitted that defendants were the only directors of the corporation, against which plaintiff had a judgment, and that defendants sold the entire assets, paying a specified amount to bona fide creditors other than plaintiff, and the balance to two of defendant directors, plaintiff's proof of her judgment against the corporation was sufficient to shift the burden of proof to defendants to show that the amount paid to the two directors was in satisfaction of bona fide claims against the corporation, in view of Civ. Code, § 309, making directors jointly and severally liable for their acts in distributing the capital stock to the prejudice of creditors.

2. Corporations ⚷361—Evidence held insufficient to show that payments made by directors were in satisfaction of bona fide debts.

In an action by a judgment creditor against the directors of the V. corporation to recover the amount of the judgment, on the ground that defendants had distributed the assets of the corporation without first paying plaintiff's claims contrary to Civ. Code, § 309, evidence held insufficient to show that payments made by defendants to two of their number represented actual and bona fide indebtedness of the corporation to the C. corporation, of which defendants were also directors.

3. Corporations 🔑346—Amendment to statute relating to liability of directors held not to restore statute of limitations as to action already begun.

Where Civ. Code, § 309, prior to its amendment in 1917, provided that no statute of limitations should bar a suit against directors of a corporation making payments out of capital stock before creditors' claims are satisfied, the omission of such provision from the amendment did not impair a cause of action which arose and on which suit was brought prior to the amendment, in view of a provision in the amendatory act that it should not affect actions already begun.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Willard and the London Assurance Corporation, against Caroline W. Dobbins and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Porter & Sutton, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Ernest C. Griffith, Jesse F. Waterman, and Denis & Loewenthal, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action by plaintiffs against defendants, to recover the amount of a judgment obtained against the Valley Gas & Fuel Company, a defunct corporation, of which the defendants were directors.

The complaint is based upon the theory that there had been a distribution of the assets of the Valley Gas & Fuel Company among the defendants contrary to the provisions of section 309, Civil Code, leaving the plaintiffs with no means of satisfying the judgment against that corporation.

Section 309 of the Civil Code in part provides that the directors of a corporation must not, until after the debts of the corporation are paid, divide or withdraw or pay to the stockholders or any of them any part of the capital stock; and for a violation of the provisions of that section the directors under whose administration the same may happen are, in their individual capacity, jointly and severally liable to the corporation and the creditors thereof to the full amount of the capital stock so divided. The section also provided, prior to the amendment of 1917, and when this action was commenced, that no statute of limitations was a bar to any suit against such directors for any sums for which they were liable by that section.

In the year 1910 the home of plaintiff, Mary E. Willard, which was partly insured by the plaintiff corporation, was destroyed by fire. Thereafter these plaintiffs brought an action against the Valley Gas & Fuel Company, alleging that the destruction of said premises was caused by its negligence. Judgment was obtained for the value of the property destroyed, and an appeal was taken and the judgment reversed. The action was retried, judgment again rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, another appeal was taken, and the judgment with a slight modification was affirmed.

Prior to the second appeal taken to this court, the Valley Gas & Fuel Company and the California Coke & Gas Company sold all of their property to the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Company for the net price of approximately $160,000. At the time of the sale of the properties to the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Company appellant Caroline W. Dobbins held $145,000 par value of an authorized bond issue of the coke company, secured by a deed of trust against its real property, and which had been issued to her in exchange for stock in the Valley Gas & Fuel Company.

Before the payment of the proceeds of said sale to the Valley Gas & Fuel Company the bonds of the coke company held by Mrs. Dobbins had been released of record in order to comply with the terms of the agreement requiring clear title to the coke company's property before payment over of the purchase price. Mrs. Dobbins was therefore, at the time the distribution of the funds derived from such sale was made, a general creditor without security. It also appeared in evidence introduced by defendants that the coke company was indebted to Mrs. Florence Dobbins Lowe in the sum of $10,000. The books of account of both corporations purported to show, and the testimony of Thaddeus Lowe, who was the president of each of them, was to the effect that in the distribution of the assets $115,000 was paid to Mrs. Dobbins and $10,000 to Mrs. Lowe on account of money due them from the coke company; that the Valley Gas & Fuel Company owed the coke company for cash advanced the sum of $172,000, and that these payments were in reduction or satisfaction of the indebtedness of the Valley Gas & Fuel Company to the coke company.

[1] The trial court found that the plaintiffs had obtained a final judgment against the Valley Gas & Fuel Company approximately for $12,000 with interest and costs; that at all the times mentioned thereafter the defendants were stockholders and constituted all the directors of the Valley Gas & Fuel Company; that they were also all the stockholders and directors of the coke company; that on the 20th day of May, 1913, all the properties of both these corporations were sold to the Los Angeles Gas & Electric company for the sum of approximately $160,000; that of this sum the coke company was entitled to approximately $48,000 and the Valley Gas & Fuel Company to $112,000; that the whole of the proceeds of the sale were paid to the Valley Gas & Fuel Company. The court also found that immediately following the receipt of the proceeds of said sale the appellants, as directors of the Valley Gas & Fuel Company, distributed approximately $35,000 in payment of various debts of said company, and that all the creditors, other than these plaintiffs, were thereby paid in full; that on the 22d day of May, 1913, the defendants paid the entire balance of the fund to two of their number, to wit, Caroline W. Dobbins, the sum of $115,000, and to Florence Dobbins Lowe the sum of $10,000; that, after the making of these payments, nothing remaining of the capital or assets of the Valley Gas & Fuel Company, no further business was done by it, and such company forfeited its charter and ceased to be a corporation on November 13, 1913. The court also found that the appellants agreed to make such payments at a joint meeting held by them as directors and stockholders of both of said corporations; that the Valley Gas & Fuel Company was not indebted to the coke company in the sum of $172,000, or, in any other sum; that the payments made to Mrs. Dobbins and Mrs. Lowe were made under "the guise, device, and subterfuge" partly of paying off bonds and partly of paying a claimed indebtedness of the Valley Gas & Fuel Company to the coke company by partly paying at the coke company's request said sum in satisfaction of the debts alleged to be owing Mrs. Dobbins and Mrs. Lowe by the coke company; and, further, that such payments were made for the purpose of absorbing and distributing the remaining assets of the Valley Gas & Fuel Company in order to defeat the claims of plaintiffs and to divide the capital stock and the assets of the Valley Gas & Fuel Company between Mrs. Dobbins and Mrs. Lowe. Further, the court found that the bonds referred to were not the bonds of the Valley Gas & Fuel Company but were the bonds only of, and a lien, upon the property of the coke company, and that if any sums were necessary to discharge the same, it was not proper to pay for the retirement thereof more than such proportion of the proceeds of the sale as belonged to the coke company. Judgment was accordingly entered for the plaintiffs for the amount demanded. The main question in the case is whether or not the evidence is sufficient to sustain the findings of the court in plaintiffs' favor that the Valley Gas & Fuel Company was not indebted to the coke company in the sum of $172,000.

The answer of the defendants admitted that they constituted all of the directors of the Valley Gas & Fuel Company; that they had sold the entire assets of that corporation and with the proceeds had expended $35,000 in payment of bona fide claims of creditors of said corporation, and that, as above stated, they had paid $115,000 to Mrs. Dobbins and $10,000 to Mrs. Lowe. These matters having been thus admitted the plaintiffs introduced their judgment against the Valley Gas & Fuel Company showing that they were creditors of that corporation in approximately the sum of $13,000, and the plaintiffs thereupon rested.

[2] We think it can fairly be said that plaintiffs had proved sufficient facts to make a prima facie case. The burden thereupon shifted to the defendants to prove the defense set up in their answer, namely, that the payments to Mrs. Dobbins and Mrs. Lowe were on account of existing indebtedness from the Valley Gas & Fuel Company to the coke company, and from the latter in turn to Mrs. Dobbins and Mrs. Lowe. They attempted to prove that the Valley Gas & Fuel Company was indebted to the coke company and that the latter was indebted to Mrs. Dobbins and Mrs. Lowe. After spending a great deal of time in a vain effort to get the books of the two corporations in evidence over the objections of plaintiffs that no foundation had been laid, in order to save time a stipulation was entered into to the effect that "the books show a claim of the coke company against the Valley Gas & Fuel Company of $172,000. The testimony of Mr. Lowe will show that his independent recollection was at that date this indebtedness or claimed indebtedness was this figure of approximately $172.000." This stipulation was immediately coupled with the statement of counsel for plaintiffs: "We do not admit the correctness of the books or of the testimony of Mr. Lowe." We think it can fairly be said that this stipulation embodies substantially all of the evidence offered by defendants in support of their claim of an existing indebtedness of the Valley Gas & Fuel Company on account of which this money was paid. It is not sufficient to compel a finding in favor of defendants upon this issue. There was no evidence that any specific sum of money was ever in fact loaned or advanced or paid by the coke company to the Valley Gas & Fuel Company. There was no evidence of any fact or state of facts out of which an indebtedness from one to the other would arise, with the possible exception of the testimony of Lowe to the effect that at some time or other the coke company leased certain property to the Valley Gas & Fuel Company at a rental of $100 per month.

The entries in the books of account touching the matter with which we are here concerned are meager and fragmentary. We are inclined to think that the evidence of the book entries falls short of the requisite proof. But, however that may be, the trial court was not compelled or required to give it any weight whatever, in view of other facts which were either proved or admitted. As before stated, some of them are as follows: The Valley Gas & Fuel Company was organized by the defendants and its capital stock was issued to them; the only consideration for its issue being the transfer to it of certain patent rights. The coke company was also organized by the defendants and its stock issued to them in consideration of the transfer to it of certain other patent rights. Then the defendants caused the coke company to issue bonds which they took from it in exchange for their shares of the Valley Gas & Fuel Company, which they thereupon transferred to the coke company. The result of these transactions was that the coke company owned all of the capital stock of the Valley Gas & Fuel Company and the defendants in turn owned all the capital stock and all of the bonds of the coke company, for which they had paid nothing at all except the transfer of some patent rights, the value of which, if they had any value, is entirely unknown. Florence Dobbins Lowe is the daughter of Mrs. Dobbins, and Thaddeus Lowe is the husband of the former, and Horace M. Dobbins is also the son of Mrs. Dobbins. The defendants at all times comprised the board of directors of both corporations, the fifth director being one McPherson, who was merely a salaried employee of the defendants, having no interest in either corporation. The defendant Lowe at all times was the manager of both corporations; the same employee was at all times bookkeeper for both corporations, and the accounts of both corporations were kept in the same set of books. Under these circumstances the trial court might well and justly have concluded that the claimed indebtedness which the books purported to show amounted to nothing more than a series of bookkeeping entries which the defendants had caused to be made to suit their own purposes.

From what has been said it would appear that, since the coke company was entitled to approximately $48,000 of the proceeds of the sale to the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Company, the payment to Dobbins and Lowe at the request of the coke company to the extent of that amount was authorized, but the remainder of the net receipts of the sale constituted the assets of the Valley Gas & Fuel Company, and the directors thereof acted in violation of the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code when they distributed those assets amongst some of the holders of its stock without first paying the amount of plaintiffs' claim.

[3] There is no merit in the remaining point that plaintiffs' account is barred by the statute of limitations. The action was brought for the violation of section 309, Civil Code, as that section stood in the year 1905, and when this action was brought. That section then contained a proviso that "no statute of limitations is a bar to any suit against such directors for any sums for which they are liable by this section." That section, as amended in the year 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 658), while omitting the above-quoted portion, still expressly provides that the section as amended shall not apply to any right, cause of action, or liability then existing, which it declared shall be prosecuted in the same manner and with the same effect as if the amendment had not been passed.

[4] It may be added that this action, having been commenced within eight months after the judgment upon which it is based, became final, and no statute of limitations has run against it. A cause of action upon a judgment does not accrue until the judgment becomes final. Feeney v. Hinckley, 134 Cal. 467, 66 Pac. 580, 86 Am. St. Rep. 290.

GLASSELL DEVELOPMENT CO. v. CITIZENS' NAT. BANK OF LOS ANGELES. (L. A. 6952.)

1. Banks and banking 🔑119, 138—Bank becomes depositor's debtor; bank cannot pay out deposit except by depositor's direction.

A bank in receiving ordinary deposits becomes the depositor's debtor, and its implied contract with him is to discharge this indebtedness by honoring such checks as he may draw on it, and it is not entitled to debit his account with payments not made by his order or direction.

2. Banks and banking 🔑148(1)—Payment on forged or altered checks by bank cannot be charged to depositor's account.

As between a bank and its depositors, payment of forged or altered checks by it is made at its peril and cannot be charged against depositor's account unless some negligent act or conduct of depositor has contributed to induce such payment, the bank itself being free from negligence, or unless by conduct depositor is estopped to deny correctness of such payment.

3. Banks and banking 🔑148(3)—Depositor owes duty to examine passbook returned with canceled checks within reasonable time.

When a depositor's passbook has been written up and returned to him with canceled checks which have been charged to his account, it is his duty to examine such checks within a reasonable time, and if they disclose forgeries or alterations to report them, failing in which he cannot, if his failure results in detriment, dispute the correctness of payment thereafter made by it on similar checks.

4. Banks and banking 🔑148(3)—Bank liable for payment of forged and altered checks if by exercise of proper care forgeries or alterations could have been discovered.

When by the exercise of proper care a bank could have discovered alterations or forgeries of checks, it must bear the loss, notwithstanding that depositor failed in his duty to examine his passbook and canceled checks.

5. Banks and banking 🔑148(1)—Alteration in amount of checks held not to suggest to bank presence of fraud.

Where, under the circumstances in which raised checks were drawn and presented, there was little, if anything, in the fact of alteration of the amounts called for to suggest to the paying teller of defendant bank the presence of fraud, especially in view of the fact that plaintiff's checks bearing similar alterations on their face, the validity of which was not disputed, were not infrequently drawn on defendant and honored by it, in action by the depositor to recover money paid out on raised checks, it cannot be said that evidence did not support the trial court's conclusion that the alterations were rendered possible by the depositor's gross negligence prior to payment thereof by the bank.

6. Banks and banking 🔑148(3)—Negligence of depositor in failing to examine monthly statement for errors cannot affect bank's liability on forged check unless bank prejudiced thereby.

The negligence of a depositor in failing to examine his monthly statement and report error therein cannot affect a bank's liability to make good to him the amount of the first forged check, since such negligence contributed in no manner to its payment, unless the bank makes affirmative showing of prejudice as the result of such failure to examine and report.

7. Banks and banking 🔑154(2)—Action controlled by statute providing that suit by depositor to recover on forged check barred in one year.

In view of the situation arising on payment by a bank of a forged or raised check, wherein the bank charges the amount thus paid to depositor's account and refuses to return to him the amount of his deposit except as diminished by such unauthorized payment, which refusal gives rise to an action to recover that particular amount, such action is the one referred to in Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3, providing that action by a depositor against the bank for payment of forged or raised check is barred after lapse of one year.

8. Constitutional law 🔑48 — Statutes given construction which will sustain them.

Statutes should be given a construction which will sustain rather than defeat them, and make them operative rather than without effect.

9. Limitation of actions 🔑67—Limitation of action by depositor on forged check begins to run from notice to depositor given by bank.

Limitation of Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3, requiring a depositor to bring an action against bank for payment of forged check within one year, begins to run from notice to the depositor given by the bank.

10. Limitation of actions 🔑66(9)—No accrual of action to depositor to recover deposit until payment is demanded or act of bank dispenses therewith.

A deposit with a bank creates a debt of the bank payable when demand for payment is made, and hence there is no accrual of the cause of action against a bank to recover the balance of a general deposit, until its payment is demanded or there is some act on the part of the bank dispensing with such demand.

11. Banks and banking 🔑154(2)—Action by depositor on forged check barred by one-year statute.

Notwithstanding that prior to amendment to Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3, requiring an action by a depositor against a bank for the payment of a forged check to be brought within one year, section 348, placing no limit as to time of bringing action to recover money deposited with a bank, would govern; section 340, dealing with a particular class, falling otherwise within the general class, under Civ. Code, § 3534, prevails, and moreover would prevail as the more recent enactment.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. T. Wood, Judge.

Action by the Glassell Development Company against the Citizens' National Bank of Los Angeles, Cal. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Stephens & Stephens, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

T. B. Cosgrove, Robert B. Murphy, and Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action by the plaintiff to recover $10,495.85 paid out of the account of the plaintiff on eight altered or raised checks between January 18, 1917, and July 23, 1918.

The plaintiff and five other corporations during the period involved in the transactions giving rise to this action maintained a joint office in the city of Los Angeles under the management of C. Wesley Roberts. One Charles H. Smith was in charge of this joint office. He had sole charge of the auditing and bookkeeping for all of these companies, and the clerks and stenographers of the office were under his supervision. Originally employed at a salary of $75 per month, he later received $150, which was subsequently reduced to $100. In their banking transactions the companies used in common a voucher form of check upon which appeared the names of all six of them.

The raised checks were all issued for the purpose of adjusting payments made for the benefit of two or more of the companies from the funds of one of them. All checks were signed by C. W. Roberts, president, and A. Glassell, secretary, and the attached voucher was initialed by Smith, under whose direction the checks were prepared and who, after they had been signed, made the alterations and caused them to be deposited. Smith was the sole custodian of cash taken in by the various companies. Some of this cash he misappropriated, and to cover the shortage thus created he altered previously signed checks issued by the plaintiff, so that upon presentation for collection the amounts of said checks were debited to the plaintiff's account and credited to that of the respective payees thereof, who in this manner were repaid the amount of Smith's peculations, but with the result of an unauthorized diminution of the plaintiff's account with the defendant.

Plaintiff's account was balanced monthly, and its passbook and canceled checks, including the raised checks, with the bank's statement showing an itemized list of deposits and withdrawals, were returned to the plaintiff monthly. Printed at the top of each of such statements was this request from the bank:

> "Please examine at once. If no error is reported in ten days the account will be considered as correct."

Notwithstanding that the officers of plaintiff knew of the custom of banks in Los Angeles to render these monthly statements and to return canceled checks to their depositors, the record shows that none of them during the five years of Smith's employment ever made or caused to be made any systematic examination of the canceled checks or bank statements, or compared either with the plaintiff's record of checks issued, or even compared the balance as shown by the passbook and monthly statements with the company's ledger account.

On October 27, 1918, one of the forgeries was discovered by Roberts, and upon being questioned Smith admitted the others.

Thereafter the plaintiff presented to the bank a check covering the entire amount of Smith's embezzlement, payment of which was refused. The plaintiff then presented a check for $3,100, covering the amounts embezzled within a year prior to the date of presentation. Of this also payment was refused, whereupon this action was brought, and resulted in a judgment in favor of the defendant.

The trial court filed findings of fact and conclusions of law in which it found that in altering the said eight checks Smith was acting in the direct scope and course of his employment, and therefore his acts were the acts of plaintiff; that the alteration of the checks by Smith was rendered possible of accomplishment by the gross negligence of the plaintiff prior to the payment of said checks respectively and not by the negligence of defendant; and that as to the first three checks the cause of action was barred by the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 340, Code of Civil Procedure.

In its appeal taken from such judgment the plaintiff urges as ground for reversal that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings or the conclusions of law based thereon.

Before discussing the evidence it may not be amiss to state the general principles governing the question of liability as between a bank and its depositors when forged checks are involved.

[1, 2] It is settled law that a bank in receiving ordinary deposits becomes the debtor of the depositor, and its implied contract with him is to discharge this indebtedness by honoring such checks as he may draw upon it, and the bank is not entitled to debit his account with payments not made by his order or direction. As between the bank and its depositors the payment of forged or altered checks by it is made at its peril and cannot be charged against the depositor's account unless some negligent act or conduct of his has contributed to induce such payment—the bank itself being free from negligence, or unless by his subsequent conduct in relation to the matter he is upon equitable principles estopped to deny the correctness of such payments. Otis Elevator Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 163 Cal. 31, 124 Pac. 704, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 529; 4 Cal. Jur. 215, 216, §§ 103, 104; 7 C. J. 683.

[3] And the weight of authority, and perhaps of reason, supports the view that when a depositor's passbook has been written up and returned to him with canceled checks which have been charged to his account, it is his duty to examine such checks within a reasonable time, and if they disclose forgeries or alterations to report them to the bank, failing in which he cannot, if his failure results in detriment to the bank, dispute the correctness of payments thereafter made by it on similar checks. 7 Corp. Jur. 687; Cal. Vegetable Union v. Crocker Nat. Bank, 37 Cal. App. 743, 174 Pac. 920; Morgan v. U. S. Mortgage & Trust Co., 208 N. Y. 218, 101 N. E. 871, L. R. A. 1915D, 741, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 462.

[4] This rule, however, assumes that the bank itself has not been guilty of negligence in making the payment, for when by the exercise of proper care it could have discovered the alteration or forgery, it must bear the loss notwithstanding that the depositor failed in his duty to examine the accounts. Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Barnes, 65 Ill. 69, 16 Am. Rep. 576; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Nichols & S. Co., 223 Ill. 41, 79 N. E. 38, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 752; Leather Mfrs. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 6 Sup. Ct. 657, 29 L. Ed. 811; 2 Morse on Banking (5th Ed.) §§ 466, 472; N. Y. Produce Exchange Bank v. Houston, 169 Fed. 785, 95 C. C. A. 251.

This subject is quite fully treated in volume 3, Ruling Case Law, 537, 538, §§ 167, 168, where it is said:

> "The majority of the suits brought by depositors to recover payments made on forged or fraudulently altered checks result from the crimes of some trusted employee of the depositor, and usually the court has to deal with a long series of successful forgeries. In such cases, after his passbook has been balanced and returned to a depositor with any of the forged or fraudulently altered checks, the authorities practically agree that in the absence of negligence on the part of the bank the failure of the depositor to notify the bank within a reasonable time that such checks have been forged or fraudulently altered will, if the delay is caused by his negligence in not using due care and diligence in examining the passbook and vouchers, or in giving notice, if he had discovered the forgeries, constitute a defense by the bank to the depositor's suit for the money subsequently paid out on similar checks. * * *
> "A bank is under an obligation to its depositor to use care in scrutinizing checks paid, to discover forgeries and render its accounts to prevent the perpetration of frauds upon its depositor. And if the bank's officers, before paying forged or altered checks, could by proper care and skill have detected the forgeries, then it cannot receive a credit for the amount of these checks, even if the depositor omitted all examination of his account. In every case where suit is brought by a depositor to recover from a bank money deposited by him, which the bank has paid out otherwise than in conformity with his orders, and the bank sets up the defense that it is nevertheless entitled to charge the depositor with such payments, because of conduct of the depositor subsequent to such payment, the preliminary question to be determined is whether the bank was or was not guilty of negligence in making the payments. If it was negligent, if its officers are found to have failed to exercise due and reasonable care in detecting the forgery or fraud, then the subsequent negligence of the depositor, his failure to perform his duty in examining his passbook and vouchers with reasonable care and report to the bank in a reasonable time any errors or mistakes, will constitute no defense, and it is generally a question for the jury whether the bank was negligent in paying a forged or fraudulently altered check."

[5] The evidence in the case at bar shows that the plaintiff did not exercise ordinary care and prudence in the manner of issuing its checks, and that it entirely failed to examine its canceled checks, passbook, and bank statements of checks paid, or to compare the same with its records, which would have immediately disclosed the forgeries, the first or any of which having been discovered, their repetition could have been avoided.

The negligence of the plaintiff in failing to examine the bank's monthly statements is admitted; but it is urged that the defendant is not in a position to take advantage of this circumstance, for the reason that it was itself negligent in paying the checks, and that the finding of the trial court that their payment was due to the plaintiff's negligence and not to that of the defendant is unsupported by the evidence.

In this contention the appellant refers particularly to the evidence in the case showing that an inspection of the raised checks readily disclosed that the figures designating the amount called for had in each case been altered, and that it was therefore the duty of the bank to refuse to honor it, or at least to have inquired of the officers of the plaintiff as to the authenticity of the alteration before treating the check as valid; and that in not doing so the bank was guilty of negligence, and is, therefore, not in a position to urge in its defense the admitted negligence of the plaintiff in failing to examine the bank's monthly statements.

Whether a given act or course of conduct is negligent, it has often been said by the courts, depends upon the circumstances of the particular case; and the degree of care to be exercised by a bank in the payment or honoring of a check must be measured by the circumstances presented to it for its consideration. In the case at bar it will be noted that each of the checks bore the genuine signature of the drawer; each was a voucher form of check upon which appeared the names of the several corporations managed by Roberts, including both the drawer and payee of the check; the respective corporations were managed by the same individual, had a common office, and their accounts were kept by the same person, and three of them carried their banks accounts with the defendant, who knew of the interlocking management of these depositors. The purpose of each check was stated on its face, and in every instance that purpose was an adjustment of accounts between the drawer and payee of the check. The checks, with the exception of one of them, the first, when presented merely entailed the debiting of the account of one of these related corporations and the crediting of that of another of them; none of them required the delivery of money to any individual.

Now, the raising of a check is usually done by and for the benefit of the payee thereof, who, in case he succeeds in cashing it, resorts to flight, rendering the recovery of the money by the bank or the drawer of the check extremely unlikely. That a corporation should present for passage to its credit the check of an allied corporation after it had been fraudulently raised is quite an unusual occurrence, and the benefit to be derived in doing so not easily conceived of. Under the circumstances in which the checks were drawn and presented there was little, if anything, in the fact of the alteration of the amount called for to suggest to the paying teller of the bank the presence of fraud, especially in view of the fact that checks of the plaintiff bearing similar alterations upon their face, the validity of which was not disputed, were not infrequently drawn upon the defendant and honered by it; at least that view might be reasonably entertained either by a trial court or a jury. It is apparent that in the case at bar the trial court so regarded the matter, and we are unable to say that the evidence does not fully and logically support its conclusion.

[6] It is evident, however, that the negligence of the plaintiff in failing to examine the bank's monthly statements and to report errors therein cannot affect the bank's liability to make good to the plaintiff the amount of the first forged check, since that negligence contributed in no manner to its payment, unless the bank makes an affirmative showing of prejudice as the result of such failure to examine and report; such prejudice usually consisting in the loss of opportunity to take timely steps for the recovery of the money of which it was fraudulently deprived, and which steps it could have taken if promptly advised of the incorrectness of its statement arising from the unauthorized payment. Janin v. London & S. F. Bank, 92 Cal. 14, 27 Pac. 1100, 14 L. R. A. 320, 27 Am. St. Rep. 82. In the case at bar the defendant has made no such affirmative showing; and it does not appear that the situation in this respect was any different at the time of the rendition of its statement disclosing the first forgery than at the time the series of forgeries was discovered and reported.

It is true the bank relies upon other acts of alleged negligence on the part of the plaintiff to exempt it from the obligation to make good the amount paid out upon this first forgery, such as the practice of the plaintiff in having its checks made out upon a typewriter, its failure to perforate them so as to disclose the respective amounts for which they were drawn, and an alleged practice on the part of the plaintiff to issue valid checks bearing erasures. But in view of the finding of the trial court that the recovery of the amount of this first check, together with the second and third, is barred by subdivision 3 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it will be unnecessary to consider the effect of this additional negligence (if such it may be called) if the court's conclusion as to the bar of the statute must be upheld.

[7] It is conceded that the present action was not commenced until more than a year elapsed after receipt by the plaintiff of notice from the bank of the payment of the first of the series of raised checks.

Said section and subdivision of the Code of Civil Procedure provide that an action "by a depositor against a bank for the payment of a forged or raised check" is barred after the lapse of one year; and if this Code provision has application to the present action it is conceded that as to the check now under consideration the action was not commenced within time.

It is very earnestly contended by the appellant that such provision is not applicable, and that its rights are governed by section 348, Code of Civil Procedure, providing that there is no limitation in the time for commencing suit against a bank for the recovery of money or other property deposited with it. In support of this contention the appellant points out that the language of the subdivision in question does not technically describe the present action. It denies that the action is one "for the payment of a forged or raised check," but is one to recover the amount of a deposit with the bank.

[8] It must be admitted that the language in question is extremely inept to describe the nature of the action; but if we bear in mind the situation which arises upon the payment by a bank of a forged or raised check, namely, that the bank charges the amount thus paid to the depositor's account, and refuses to return to the depositor the amount of his deposit except as diminished by such unauthorized payment, which refusal gives rise to an action against the bank to recover that particular amount, it is sufficiently obvious that such action is the one referred to. Unless the statute applies to such cases, it is, as claimed by the defendant, meaningless.

It is a cardinal rule in the construction of statutes that they should be given one which will sustain rather than defeat them, which will make them operative, if the language will permit, rather than render them without effect. Lewis' Sutherland, Stat. Construction (2d Ed.) § 498; Civ. Code, § 3541; Cuthbert v. Woodman, 185 Cal. 43, 45, 195 Pac. 673. It has been held that the word "for" means "by reason of," "because of," and "on account of," and that a statute prescribing a limitation on "actions for injury to the person * * * caused by negligence" should be interpreted to mean action "by reason of" or "because of" or "on account of" injuries to the person caused by negligence. Sharkey v. Skilton, 83 Conn. 503, 77 Atl. 950.

[9, 10] This is the construction given to this provision in the case of Cal. Vegetable Union v. Crocker Nat. Bank, 37 Cal. App. 743, 174 Pac. 920. That action arose out of the payment of a series of forged checks charged to the plaintiff's bank account. The court held that the effect of this section applied to that action was to bar all checks which were paid more than a year after the rendition of the bank's statement to the depositor before its commencement. In passing it may be said that while the syllabus in the report of that case states that "the provision of the statute of limitations embodied in subdivision 3 of section 340, C. C. P., that an action against a bank by a depositor for the payment of a forged check must be brought within one year, begins to run on presentment and payment of the check, and not upon discovery of the forgery," still we think this is not the true effect of the decision, since in that case the year provided by the statute had elapsed not only from the time of the payment of the checks but also from the time of the rendition by the bank of its monthly statement showing such payment; in fact, that action was not commenced until one year and seven months after the time when the depositor received such monthly account, so that the depositor allowed more than a year to elapse before bringing its action after it had had ample time in which to discover the forgeries if it had exercised reasonable diligence, and this fact is mentioned in the opinion of the court. The true rule, we think, is that the year prescribed by the statute commences to run from notice to the depositor given by the bank. It is the settled rule that the relation between a bank and its depositor arising out of a general deposit is that of debtor and creditor. The deposit creates a debt of the bank payable as and when demand for payment is made. Accordingly, it is the general rule that there is no default on the part of the bank, and hence no accrual of a cause of action against it to recover the balance of a general deposit, until its payment is demanded or there is some act on the part of the bank dispensing with such demand. Mitchell v. Beckman, 64 Cal. 117, 28 Pac. 110; 7 C. J. 663, § 366, and cases cited; 3 R. C. L. 569, and cases cited. But the basis of the rule, and indeed the statement of it, shows its proper limitations. A demand is ordinarily necessary because until it is made and refused there is no denial by the bank of its liability to pay and no default out of which a cause of action could arise. Where, however, the bank, either in terms or in effect, has denied liability to the depositor for the amount in question, this is "an act on the part of the bank dispensing with such demand," the cause of action accrues, and the statute of limitations, where one is applicable, is set in motion.

[11] Undoubtedly before the amendment to subdivision 3 of section 340, Code of Civil Procedure, the provisions of section 348 governed an action of the character here in question. But that section declares a general rule, and subdivision 3 of section 340 deals with a particular class of cases falling otherwise within the general rule. In such a case the particular prevails over the general. Civ. Code, § 3534. Moreover, the particular rule is of more recent enactment, and on that ground alone would govern the case if applicable.

We hold, therefore, that the trial court correctly concluded that the plaintiff's action, in so far as the check now under consideration is concerned, was barred.

The respondent urges an additional reason why the judgment appealed from is correct, viz., that the trial court found that the forgeries were all committed by an employee of the plaintiff in the course of his employment and under such circumstances as to render the plaintiff liable for the wrong thereby committed, citing Otis Elevator Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 163 Cal. 31, 124 Pac. 704, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 529; but since the judgment must be affirmed for the reasons already given, it is not necessary to consider this further point.

Judgment affirmed.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

ALBERTSON v. WESTLAKE et al. (Civ. 4571.) (District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 28, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 26, 1923.) Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge. Action to foreclose a mortgage by R. Albertson against W. J. Westlake and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. Sawyer & Sawyer and F. W. Sawyer, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Donahue, Hynes & Hamlin, of Oakland, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants in an action to foreclose a mortgage on real property. The mortgage was executed by one Westlake to the plaintiff. Thereafter Westlake executed his deed of trust to the Citizens' Bank of Fruitvale, predecessor of defendant Bank of Italy, covering the same property. This deed of trust was recorded prior to the recordation of the mortgage. The trial court found that, at the time of the making and delivery of the deed of trust, the plaintiff, for a valuable consideration, entered into an agreement with the Citizens' Bank that he would waive and relinquish the priority of his said mortgage over said deed of trust, that said deed of trust should be a prior and superior lien upon said real property, and that the lien of plaintiff's mortgage should be second or inferior to said deed of trust. The only attack upon the judgment is based upon the ground that the evidence does not support these findings. We have examined the record, and find that there is sufficient evidence to support each finding under attack. Judgment affirmed.

DOON v. WALCOTT et al., Civil Service Commission of City and County of San Francisco. (Civ. No. 4420.) (District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 28, 1923.) Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge. Application for a writ of mandate by James M. Doon, opposed by Earle A. Walcott and others, as members of and constituting the Civil Service Commission of the City and County of San Francisco. From a judgment denying the application, petitioner appeals. Affirmed. William A. Kelly, of San Francisco, for appellant. Geo. Lull, City Atty., and Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment denying appellant's petition for a writ of mandate to compel the respondents, constituting the civil service commission of the city and county of San Francisco, to restore his name to a place upon the register of candidates eligible to appointment to the position of general clerk in the classified civil service of the city and county of San Francisco. The appeal is submitted on the record in Gilbert v. Civil Service Commission (Civil No. 4390; Cal. App.) 215 Pac. 97. No briefs are filed upon this appeal and therefore nothing new is presented for consideration. Upon the authority of the Gilbert Case the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LENNERT. (Cr. No. 685.) (District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 24, 1923.) Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Percy S. King, Judge. Edward Lennert was convicted of burglary, and he appeals from the judgment and order denying a new trial. Affirmed. Russell F. O'Hara, of Vallejo, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Appellant was convicted of three separate acts of burglary charged in one information in different counts, and he has appealed from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. There has been no appearance for him in this court nor has any argument been submitted in his behalf. We have, however, carefully examined the transcript and have found no error therein. The motion for a new trial was made solely upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, but it was promptly denied by the trial court. It would serve no useful purpose to set out the evidence, but we are satisfied that it was amply sufficient to justify the conviction. The judgment and order are affirmed.
